SURGEON CREELEY TALKED TOO FREELY

Now Under Investigation by the Board of Health.

PROMISES TO DAIRYMEN
 Nicholas Hansen Claims That the Veterinary Broke Faith With Him.

THE OFFICIAL A BORROWER.
 A Scandal That Would Not Down Though Kept a Dark Secret.

Another City Hall scandal has been added to the already long list, and the investigation that is now inevitable promises to show a bad state of affairs among certain officials employed by the San Francisco Board of Health.

Dr. E. J. Creely, who was recently appointed veterinary of the board, is the official who is under fire, and the desperate efforts of the members of the board to keep the matter secret indicate that the affair is considered of the gravest importance and one that should be kept from public notice if possible in order that odium should not attach to the department.

As usual in its investigations the board did not court the light of public inquiry, but began a series of star-chamber meetings, which will probably be discontinued in favor of open sessions now that the "cat is out of the bag."

Several weeks ago information reached the Health Office that Dr. Creely was talking freely among dairymen of his powers as veterinary of the board, and in the way he could do his "friends" in the service of deluding the testing of their cows for tuberculosis until suspected animals were weeded out or sent out of the county to graze on a barren state.

The board was also told that Creely had talked learnedly of the prevalence of the dread disease among cattle and the large number that would have to be killed before the board would be satisfied.

The board was also told that Creely had informed a number of dairymen that he had a mixture that was a sure cure for tuberculosis, and that while the price was high those who became purchasers would be free from the disease at least for several months to come, the intimation being given that the intimation being given those conducting the inspections would share in the profits of the medicine.

When the matter became so much of a subject of comment among the dairymen that the board could no longer delay action Creely was called up and asked for an explanation of his conduct. In his extremity he took refuge behind that time-honored excuse that his talk was all intended as a joke.

Of course his reported statement that his friend Dockery, the Milk Inspector, was to receive one-third of the profits of the deal would not be taken seriously.

At the same time the board had information that placed the question beyond a mere doubt, and to prevent at least one scheme that had been put up from being carried out, Dr. Creely's license was suspended and he was ordered to appear before the board of health to answer for his conduct.

Many Lapses of the Financial Agent Were Not Presented to the Grand Jury.

It transpires that quite a volume of documentary evidence, in the form of books, papers and letters, relating to Leroy G. Harvey's management of the property affairs of Mrs. Emily A. P. Smith, was placed in the hands of District Attorney Barnes a week before the Grand Jury indictments were presented to Judge Slack.

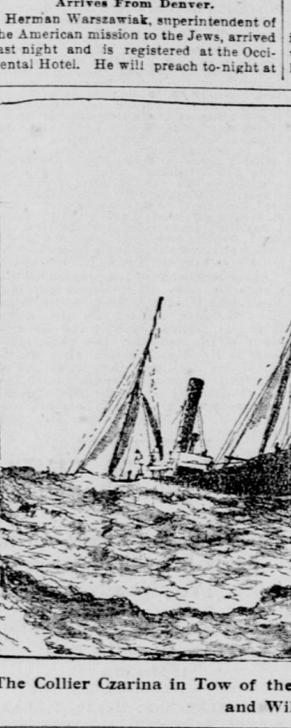

It is stated, on what seems to be the best of authority, that the misappropriation of the Oakland gas stock did not constitute the only lapse from fair dealing in Harvey's stewardship, but the District Attorney deemed the proof so conclusive and
