DEATH OF PEOPLES

Remains of Hapless Miners Found by Friends at Cumberland

Evidence That the Sixty-Five Men Who Were Imprisoned Lost Their Lives by Suffocation.

CUMBERLAND, B. C., Feb. 19.—The bodies of six of the sixty-five victims of the mine explosion here were taken out today, and more are expected to be reached to-night. The first bodies, those of Dan McInnes and his Japanese helper, were brought up at 10 o'clock, four days less a half-hour from the time the accident occurred.

When the shift came off this morning they reported having found the torn coat which switched the air current into his stall, so close had they carried the brat-wood to the working place. The shift reported having carried the work on to his stall. They found him and the Japanese helper in the morning, their arms clasped tightly across their faces as though they had struggled to shield themselves from the deadly after-damp while running toward the shaft. They had not gone more than twelve feet from where they had been working. The faces of both were black and their bodies were much swollen. Their hair and mustaches were not singed. Not a timber was shaken by the explosion.

McInnes was working farthest in No. 6 and nearest No. 5, and the finding of the body indicates without doubt that all the men had died.

At 2 p. m. the remains of a Chinese and a Japanese helper were taken out, and at 4 p. m. the bodies of Joseph Cross and Alexander Davis were found lying on their faces, with their bodies sprawling, as though they had fallen when overcome by the gas.
