Letters Relating to Woman of the Tenderloin Involve O'Grady

LETTERS held by the graft prosecutors which relate to Ethel Scott, a woman of the tenderloin, will be used, if necessary, to compel Alexander O'Grady to come out of hiding and testify before the grand jury against Ruef and Schmitz.

Graft Prosecutors to Force Him to Return

Evidence is in possession of the grand jury sufficient to indict Alexander O'Grady for perjury, and a warrant of court may bring him back to San Francisco should he persist in refusing to return voluntarily.

The testimony of ex-Police Commissioner Reagan and Police Commissioner McLaughlin will be used as the basis for the perjury indictment against O'Grady if such a course is necessary. Their stories, as told to the grand jury, flatly contradict the testimony of O'Grady, and now that Captain Mooney has acquainted the prosecution with some of the most intimate secrets of the police department, there is an abundance of evidence for action against the young man.

It was through the confession of one of Ruef's most trusted lieutenants that the prosecution secured the information with which it hopes to force O'Grady to return against the administration.

Just what the prosecution holds over O'Grady it will not make public at this time. This much is known, however: A number of letters have come into the possession of Burns and Heney, and these letters involve the name of a notorious woman of the old tenderloin. This woman lived before the earthquake in the Hotel Gotham, and afterward moved to some city in the north-west.

It was to find this woman that Messrs. Heney and Burns kept the tip, and it is to avoid fretting the realization of that tip that O'Grady left in such a hurry. The prosecution, however, is ready at any time to force him to return under indictment for perjury. The Ethel Scott incident will be held in reserve.
