

A PAGE FOR THE YOUNGER JUNIORS

HE SAW THAT SHE HAD A QUEENLY HAND

There are people who have hearts of glass. If you touch them they emit a tone as fine as that of silver bells. But if by accident you knock against them roughly they break in two.

Once upon a time there lived a king and queen who had three daughters, and all three had hearts of glass.

"Children," said the queen, "take care of your hearts; they are made of brittle ware." And the princesses promised to do so. But one day, as the eldest was leaning out of the window and looking down into the garden below, watching the bees and butterflies as they circled about, she pressed too hard against the casement, when—clink—came a sound as if something had been broken, and she dropped down dead.

Some time after this the second princess was drinking a cup of coffee, which was too hot, and again there came a sound as if something was breaking, but not quite as hard as the first time, and she also fell to the ground. But when her mother raised her up and looked at her she soon found to her great joy that she was not dead, but her heart had only received a rent. "What will become of our daughter?" said the king and queen to one another. "She has a rent in her heart, and be it ever so small, how easily it may break. We will have to take great care of her."

But the princess herself said to them: "Do not worry about me. Sometimes things that are patched wear as well as new ones."

Meanwhile the third daughter had grown up to be a very beautiful princess. Kings' sons from all part of the world came to woo her, but the old king had grown wise through trouble and said: "I have but one daughter who is perfect, and she has a heart of glass, and if she is to marry it can only be a king who is a glazier, too, and knows how to handle such brittle ware." Yet among all the suitors that came there was not one who knew anything about glazing, and they all had to depart. Now among the pages in the castle there was one who was almost ready to be knighted; he had but to carry the princess' train three times more and he would become a knight. After he had carried the train once he saw that her carriage was a royal one. When he carried it a second time the princess said to him: "Let go of my train for a moment; give me your hand and lead me up the stairs, but gracefully, as becomes a page who leads a princess." When he did as she bade him he saw that she had a queenly hand. And she also noticed something, but what it was he will not say till later. Finally, when he carried her train the third time the princess turned and said to him: "How gracefully you carry my train; no one has carried it as well before." And then the page found that her speech was most queenly. And when he had finished and had become a knight the king thanked him and congratulated him and said he could now depart. When he was leaving the princess stood at the garden gate and said to him: "You have carried my train better than any one else. Oh, that you were a king and a glazier." Thereupon he said he would try his best to become that, and if she was willing to wait for him he would certainly come back.

So he went to a glazier and asked him whether he could not use an apprentice. "Oh, yes," answered the glazier, "but it takes four years to learn the trade. In the first year you are taught to fetch the rolls from the baker and to wash and comb and dress the children. In the second year you learn to put the putty into the cracks, and in the third year you learn to cut glass and put in panes, and in the fourth year you become a glazier." Then he asked the glazier whether he couldn't begin from the back, for that would be quicker work. But the glazier told him the right way to begin was at the beginning or he would not turn into a respectable glazier. So he was satisfied to do it.

In the first year he went to the baker's to fetch the rolls and washed and combed and dressed the children. In the second he put the putty into the cracks, and in the third he learned how to cut the glass and put it in, and in the fourth he became a glazier. Then he again donned his nobleman's clothes, bade the glazier goodbye, and left, all the while wondering how he would go about it to become a king. As he walked along the streets, all lost in thought, a man came up to him and asked him whether he had lost anything, for his eyes had been turned to the ground. He answered: "Though I have not really lost anything, yet I am looking for something, namely, for a kingdom," and he asked the man whether he could not tell him what to do in order to become a king. "If you were a glazier," said the man, "I could tell you what to do."

When he had said this the man began to tell him a story of the three sisters with the glass hearts, and how the king had decided to let the youngest daughter marry only a glazier. "At first," he continued, "he made a condition that the glazier who should win her would have to be a prince of royal blood, but as no one can be found who is a glazier and a king at the same time, he has decided to make no other conditions, but a glazier must be. "What are the conditions?" asked the young knight. "First of all the princess must have a liking for him, and his hands must be as soft as velvet. If a glazier can be found whose hands are as soft as velvet, the king will give him his daughter, and after his death the son in law will become king. There have been any number of glaziers in the castle already, but the princess does not like any of them; besides, none of them has soft white hands, but rather very coarse ones, as one can not otherwise expect of ordinary glaziers."

On hearing this the young knight went to the palace, told the king who he was, how he had once been a page, that he had become a glazier for love of his daughter, and that he would like to marry her.

The king sent for the princess and asked whether the young knight pleased her fancy, and when she said yes, because she recognized the page at once, he told him to take off his gloves and show whether his hands were as soft as velvet. But the princess did not think this was necessary; she was quite sure that his hands were like velvet, for this she had noticed at the time when he led her up stairs. So both conditions had been fulfilled, and as the princess had found a husband who was a glazier and at the same time one whose hands were as soft as velvet, he was able to take good care of her heart, and he did so until she died. The second sister, however, whose heart had a rent, became an aunt, and the very best one in the world. Not only did the princess' children say so, but all the other people as well. She taught the little princesses to read and to pray and to sew dolls' clothes.

She, too, grew to be very old, although her heart had received a rent. If any one was surprised at this she would answer: "Anything that receives a rent in its early life does not always break at once." Sometimes it lasts twice as long. And that is true.

WINNERS OF THE JUNIOR CALL'S PAINT BOX PRIZES

ALPHABET ANIMALS IN PATCHWORK PUZZLES

It's nice to know they have reformed the deadly Basilisk. You now can look him in the eye without the slightest risk.

There is a monster, it is true, whose aspect must appal, Yet what if the Chimera never lived on earth at all?

Of course the Dinotherium with dreadful crimes is linked, But need it matter if he was? The creature is extinct.

To find the animals which are hidden in the patchwork picture puzzle proceed along the same lines as in putting together a mosaic puzzle or a jig saw puzzle, for all these puzzles are of exactly the same kind. The verse at the side of the puzzle tells the story which the picture that is to be made from the 20 pieces illustrates. First, cut out the entire mosaic and paste it on heavy wrapping paper before cutting out the separate pieces. This is merely to make it easier to handle the pieces, and it will also make the puzzle last longer. After you have thus reinforced the mosaic cut out the separate pieces. The white parts are to be cut away. In cutting out the parts which make up the picture be very careful to cut just within the black lines or the pieces will not fit nicely.

The Apteryx proved to be a most fascinating bird to the younger juniors, as will be seen by the very long roll of honor which the Junior Call has the privilege of publishing today, and there were many other names which should be on the roll of honor, only they were received too late for use. Some other younger juniors found the Apteryx and pasted the picture correctly, but neglected to inclose their names and addresses. It would be better to write the name and address on the same paper on which the picture is pasted. Most of the younger juniors do this, but some forget.
