GOLDBERG'S GUY

The Call's Daily Short Story

THE "LIVE WIRE"

By EDMUND MOBERLY

When poor health forced Sam Miller to retire from the Burroughs-Miller Advertising company, Richard Burroughs found himself in sole possession of the good will, assets, liabilities and responsibilities connected with a growing publicity business. The firm had always been an aggressive one, and Burroughs set about at once to see that it took no backward steps under his ownership. He soon found this a task far beyond the abilities of one man, and he, therefore, decided that he must seek a partner who would relieve him of some of the financial and executive burdens which the firm's management imposed upon him.

He received numerous replies to his advertisement in a journal devoted to his line of business, but of the many that replied none were chosen. Most of the applicants had abundant capital, but little else. Hope alone, Burroughs knew, was a doubtful asset in a highly competitive business like his. What he was looking for was a "live wire" and he began looking to despair of ever finding one when one afternoon his office boy entered his private office bearing a card.

"Show him in," was Dick's terse command. The boy grinned and vanished, and returned almost immediately with a handsome young woman.

Burroughs discarded his pipe in haste and registered a slight frown of displeasure against the office boy. "I beg your pardon," he managed to say, "but, you see, I rather expected—" "To see a man," she finished with a laugh. "They all do."

"But you must admit your card is rather noncommittal."

"I do," she replied, delving into the handbag she carried. "I am already engaged to a man, but I have been prepared to assume a just financial interest in the firm if we come to terms."

Dick's hesitancy vanished. This indeed sounded like business. The Caldwell-Martin line of calendars and advertising matter had long been the property of a commercial alliance with this clean cut young business woman.

Arnapcho, Colo.—My daughter, while in infancy, had scald head very badly. The eruption came as pimples, then a scab would form. If the scab was removed yellow excretion would ooze out and would spread where the eruption was. It was on her face and scalp. I used Cuticura Soap for her every time she was bathed, using also Cuticura Ointment afterward, also every night. I used less than a box of Cuticura Ointment and one cake of Cuticura Soap and she was cured of the trouble." (Signed) Mrs. Clyde Snyder, Sept. 23, 1912.
