A KEYSTONE CHASE

Requests for the address of Mary Pickford have come to the office. Address letters to 270 Riverside Drive, New York.

Some one remarked the other day that I must have a tremendous imagination or I couldn't play so many different types and characters. It is true my imagination has always stimulated me and I so sincerely live the role I am playing that I often forget to return to the everyday Mary Pickford until I am reminded by those around me to "come back to earth again."

As a youngster I magnified everything from my joys to my sorrows just because my imagination was always running riot. My first memories are of my little bedroom in our home in Canada. As I lay in my crib, I remember looking up at the ceiling, fascinated by the fantastic shapes traced there by the raindrops. And then my eyes would wander to the garlands of flowers which formed a border around the top of the wallpaper. Those large clusters of roses looked to me, as I half closed my eyes, like little boys and girls in bright, gaudy dresses, dancing around and around the room, never out of step or never letting go of each other's hands.

Mother always understood and never ridiculed me, but some of the other children did as I grew older. And I became frightened by their teasing laughs that mocked the telling of my strange imaginary experiences with all my fairy folk.

But these experiences often got me into trouble. I can now remember one amusing incident during a visit to an aunt who lived in the country. The country was glorious and full of mystery to me and I longed to roam about seeking adventure.

I would take my books and go into the field, where I could crawl into a haystack and stretch out comfortably in the sweet-smelling hay. Sometimes I would stay there for hours, but other days I would become restless and wander far across the meadows back of the house. My aunt often scolded me for disappearing, and to frighten me she warned me that a bull, a terrible fire-breathing creature, roamed about on the adjoining Thurston ranch. This kept me pretty close to home for about two days; then, with the spirit of a pioneer, I started across country again.

The Pursuit of the Phantom. I found a wonderful spot, a little clump of bushes under a great spreading tree, and just a few feet from a babbling brook that zigzagged across the fields. Opening the paper bag in which I had stored two large greasy doughnuts and an apple, I was munching away contentedly when I heard something rustle in the bushes back of me. I wheeled around wondering, "There, looking down upon me with fierce eyes and dilating nostrils, was the bull!"

I jumped to my feet, my knees so weak they could hardly support my body, and with a shrill scream I cleared that ground in three-foot leaps until I reached the creek. I do not think any pole vaulter could have done better than I, as I sprang like a little goat from one rock to the other until I reached the other side.

Then I ran as fast as I could, not daring to turn around, knowing he was chasing me—bearing him right back of me, snorting and kicking up the dust as he galloped. I really believed he was so close I could feel his breath fairly scorching the back of my neck. It seemed to me it was miles and miles before I reached my aunt's front porch and sank exhausted into her arms, telling her between gasps of my awful experience.

And now it is almost with shame that I am forced to tell you the truth, knowing that you will appreciate that I suffered, through their teasing, almost as much as if I had really been in danger of my life. That bull was a nice, mild, kind-faced old Jersey cow, and out of pure friendliness she had brushed her way through the bushes to share my doughnuts and apple.

(P. S.—The only person in the world I wish I had never known anything about it was Jack, but some one told him. Isn't that a delicious tidbit for a small brother to have on his sister.)

Mary Pickford.

"SPIRITS" IN COFFINS SOMETIMES TURN OUT TO BE "BOOZE"

Spirits in coffins have had Tennessee legal authorities guessing. The "medium" in the case was a coffin company of Chattanooga. The company claims no supernatural powers. It was simply medium of distribution. Neither were the spirits of the etherial variety. They were the substantial kind, commonly known as "boozers."

An employee evidently thought he was doing nothing wrong—although he didn't tell the boss—to use the spirits as a stimulant to the coffin industry in dry territory, so a few quarts sometimes were included as "lagniappe" in coffins shipped to customers. The federal authorities could not see it exactly that way, however, especially since the coffins were made use of by "live ones."

The new form of the old game of L. C. legging, varieties of which are said to be increasing in proportion to the spread of legalized prohibition, was unearthed by Inspector Webster Spates, of the Department of Justice, Washington.

Careful investigation of the spirits by several well qualified officers is said to have confirmed the fact that it was real whisky, similar to the variety which led the little mouse to want to hunt up the cat and the proverbial rabbit to spit in the bull-dog's eye.

As is customary in bootlegging cases in dry territory, no attempt was made to smuggle in the less harmful malt beverages. Quicker action was said to be desired.

Opponents of state-wide prohibition are asserting that the case evidences the fact that the only real solution to the temperance question is through education, not legislation, or through the substitution of the less alcoholic beverages for the more intoxicating spirituous liquors.
