

CINCINNATI DOWNED IN OPENING BATTLE WITH BROOKLYNITES

BROOKLYN, Aug. 4.—Burleigh Grimes and his spit-ball defeated Cincinnati in the opening game with Brooklyn Thursday, 4 to 0. The Reds got but five safe hits off the offerings of the veteran.

Eppa Rixey started on the hill for Moran's men, but he was hit opportunistically, especially in the second frame. Wheat fanned. Myers singled to second and Schmandt walked. Andy High scored them both with a long line drive to right center for three bases. High scored on Miller's long fly to Burns.

Grimes had the ball working fine for the afternoon's hill and had the Cincinnati batters eating out of his hand. The ball would break downward and the result was that the Redlegs could hit nothing but infield grounders. All in all, the Dodgers had 20 assists, showing that the Reds were not hitting out of the infield.

The Reds started out to score in the second inning. Olson muffed Fonseca's fly. Pinelli singled to left and they had a fine chance to score. Fonseca went to sleep on second and a peg from the outfield caught him off the base. Cavney walked, but Wingo and Rixey grounded to the infield, cutting down the two runners.

Harper Connects. Harper was the only Red to hit the offerings of the spit-ball thrower with any consistency. He pounded a double and a single in three trips to the plate. He was on the bases three times, but that was all there was to it. He died each time.

Ivan Olson was the star performer for the Robins. He gave the Reds opportunities to score in the first part of the game, but they could not improve their chances, then the veteran infielder settled down and cut off the grounder after grounder during the remainder of the game.

Moran's men are a batting slump at present, but they are due for a brace some time.

Pivot Blow, Foulest Ever Used in Prize Ring, Felled Dempsey

By FRANK G. MENKE

Memories of the pivot blow which felled Jack Dempsey ("The Nonpareil") 33 years ago were recalled the other night when a youthful ringman, without knowing what sort of punch he was using, nearly suffered disqualification for trying it.

Generations have come and gone since that memorable night in San Francisco when George LeBlanche first used that blow which ever afterwards was barred from the prize ring. But the story of the fight which was ended by that punch, ever will remain as one of the most dramatic in ring annals.

Dempsey then was at the height of his glorious career—a champion of the middleweights, a conqueror of heavyweights—a super-man of the padded arena. Up to that August night in 1889 he had never lost a fight in his entire career.

LeBlanche had through 1887 and 1888 established quite a reputation for himself and in 1889 buried a challenge at Dempsey. The champion, who never ducked a foe in his fistie life-time, accepted and a finish battle, for August 27, 1889 was arranged for San Francisco.

LeBlanche, in reality, was a heavy-weight. He towered above Dempsey and was at least 30 pounds heavier. But from the outset of that fight, Dempsey was the master.

Knowing the amazing ability of LeBlanche to withstand hard punches, Dempsey determined not to strive for a quick knock-out over his huge rival. Instead he elected to jab and peek away at LeBlanche until he had cut the big fellow down to a point where a few well placed and powerful blows would win for him.

Through 31 rounds of warfare, Dempsey methodically chopped away at LeBlanche. Slowly but surely the splendid strength and endurance powers of LeBlanche had ebbed away. As the thirty-second round started, it didn't seem humanly possible for LeBlanche to last another full round.

Time was called for the thirty-second. Dempsey slipped in and jabbed LeBlanche into a position where a pile driver right might do the trick. But even as he did so, LeBlanche turned around with his back to Dempsey.

And then the tragedy happened. Lifting his arm to the level of his shoulder, and holding it straight out and as rigid as a crowbar, LeBlanche whirled around with all the final strength and speed he could summon.

The swing gave him added impetus. As he completed the half circle, the forearm of the rigid arm struck Dempsey on the chin. The effect—and the power—was almost the same as though Dempsey had been hit by an iron bar.

With barely a quiver of the body, Dempsey fell in a crumpled heap upon the floor.

The scene which followed perhaps never will have a parallel in ringdom. The knockout of the man, who, but a moment before, seemed an absolutely certain victor, practically paralyzed every person in the audience.

The referee never moved from the spot where he had been standing when Dempsey was hit. He did nothing—could do nothing else—but look at Dempsey, then at LeBlanche and then back at the unconscious victim of the foulest blow ever used in a prize ring.

And LeBlanche, like the referee, seemed petrified. Not only did he stand like a graven image, but even the arm which had struck down Dempsey remained in the air in exactly the same position as when it had hit the champion.

Not a sound came from the audience. It was hushed like the hush in a graveyard at night.

Just how long Dempsey lay on the floor no one ever has been able to say for the referee counted and the timers, too stunned, never looked at their watches to register the passage of time.

At last someone moved in the Dempsey corner. The sound galvanized others to action. They came forward into the ring, picked up the fallen champion and carried him to his corner. LeBlanche, still like a man in a stupor, walked to his, then climbed through the ropes and went to his dressing room.
