The Daily Journal.
THE BATTLE AT CHANCELLORSVILLE.

Details of the Fighting on Saturday and Sunday, May 3d and 4th—Diagram of the Battlefield—A Connected Account from Official Information.

[Correspondence of the Boston Journal.]
WASHINGTON, May 7, 1863.
Elated and depressed. Cheered and chagrined. Exultant and desponding. The rebels were between two fires. Hooker had them just where he wanted them. They could not retreat. They would be annihilated. The rebellion was nearly at an end. Such was the talk—the feeling. All is now changed. The army is back in its camp. The victory that was to be, is not.

It will be my endeavor to present a condensed review of the operations of the two armies, commencing with last Saturday, sitting, with what ability I may have, the true from the false, using official information.

THE POSITION AT CHANCELLORSVILLE.
Saturday Morning. The single house which makes Chancellorsville is at a crossing at the intersection of the Gordonsville plank road and the old Orange county turnpike. Standing on the piazza and looking south, you look directly down the old turnpike road a mile, to Scott's run. As you face south, the Rappahannock is at your back. It is five miles to United States ford. In front of the house and west of it, along the plank road, is a small field; all the rest is woods. In this field is an immense train of artillery, ammunition wagons, hospitals, ambulances, supplies, and troops. Here are General Hooker's headquarters—the grand center of a hundred thousand men—the brain which thinks for them all.
