Miss Clark's Recital.

On Tuesday evening, Miss Marion Clark, of Lamotte, Missouri, sang a program for graduation requirement, in Murrell Hall, Central College. The weather was most inclement, nevertheless there attended one of the largest audiences ever present at a pupils recital. That those present were pleased and thoroughly in sympathy with the singer, was most apparent by the genuine and continued applause after each number.

Miss Clark is a blond of charming manner and delightful stage presence; her voice is a lyric soprano of good range, beautiful quality and excellent timbre. She exhibited a marked degree of temperament, and charmed her audience by her effective use of nuances as well as by her facile colorature and her sustained tone work. The program presented was perhaps the most pretensions on given for some years at Central. There was not a number in the whole program that did not present some special feature of technique or tone, and at every point Miss Clark demonstrated in a convincing manner her ability and resource in vocal attainment.

Two numbers especially enjoyable were the "Thou brilliant Bird" by David, in which the technical work in the beautiful colorature parts was excellently done, and the popular Reichardt song, "When the Roses Bloom," exemplifying the exact opposite in vocalism. This song was admirably sung; in tone, in breadth of style, and realization of mood, her interpretation was a great accomplishment. The audience demanded she sing it the second time.

The whole recital is worthy of sincere and elaborate commendation and the program given below is one in which the quality, the arrangement and presentation reflects much credit on the singer, and the voice department of Central College.

Miss Landrum's Recital.

Those who attended the reading of "Sister Beatrice," a drama by that great Belgian dramatist, Maurice Maeterlinck, Saturday night, were made to comprehend what thoroughness is exacted from pupils in that department of the college. The memorizing of this drama is a mere bagatelle compared to the study of its dramatic possibilities, and the student who can present, in no uncertain manner, each character of the drama, and convey to an audience the passion and pathos written in the lines of "Sister Beatrice," has done something worth while. Miss Landrum did this. Her exposition of this drama encompassed with a most graceful stage presence made her recital one of the most satisfying ever given at the college.

Miss Landrum is the daughter of T. R. Landrum of Waverly. Her many friends in this vicinity will be glad to hear of her success in this department of the college.

From the Capitol.

Washington, D. C.
April, 1913.
Special correspondence of the Intelligencer.

The horror in Ohio and Indiana has shown our new President a new light. He has taken this matter so much to heart at the loss of life that he has sent his ablest and best men to the front with the promise that he, himself, when this letter is written, will go to the front and do what he can to ameliorate conditions. It shows that the Democratic President keeps in touch with the whole country and that nothing can happen that will affect his sympathetic proposition like the flood in Ohio and Indiana.

Whether the loss in Dayton, Ohio, should be 5000 or more, it shows that the President of the United States has passed on the situation and whether one man is dead or not his sympathy is aroused and his heart beats in unison with the people of the United States. In other words, the people of this country have a Democratic President and he is democratic in every sympathy and in every resource. He is President of the United States and intends to make himself felt as such by the people of this Nation.

If he can do any good by going to those States he will be seen there. If he cannot by word of messenger from his trusted lieutenant he will not go. It probably will not be necessary for him to go, but whether he goes or not his intention to go is one of the things we will consider long after the whole affair is over and the dead buried.

The President has many things on his mind, especially the appointment of ambassadors and the like, but suffering appeals to him over and above the appointment of people to positions and will continue to appeal to him during his whole administration. He is a minority President so far as the votes go, but the people will look at Roosevelt and Taft and Wilson, and figure on which one has shown the most manhood in a crisis in this country and the verdict will go to Wilson. He stood today absolutely impelled by the situation and ready to go and risk his own life in a friendly attitude toward the people of Ohio and Indiana.

There are nearly 250,000 people out of homes and without a dollar and he is ready to go to them and tell them that they must go to work; that he was behind every dollar that they were receiving and that he was President of the United States and would see that Congress passed a law enacting that every dollar spent for them and for their sustenance would be covered back in the treasury and that the people who can afford to pay must pay the difference between them and the dollars that are spent for them.

That President Wilson did not go on this trip was the advice and counsel of his Cabinet and not his own consideration and feelings in the matter. The latest reports state that the loss of life is not so great as was supposed in the very fulness of the catastrophe. There have been thousands thrown out of employment and their homes wiped out and who will have to live on charity money for the next few months. The President knows this and is aware that they will have to be taken care of by their countrymen and he volunteered to tell them so personally but was dissuaded by his Cabinet. The fact that his mind has been turned on the sufferings of the people instead of the sufferings of the politicians, will go forward to show the people that they can trust a man who feels.

After Congress meets the politician will come to the front again and you can then look for numerous appointments to the public places that the President has to give out. Until this matter in Indiana and Ohio is satisfactorily adjusted there, there will be no appointments made and no politician should look for any.
