Range Improvement Will Increase Meat Supply.

From the Forest Service, U. S. Department of Agriculture, Salt Lake City, January 16.—Albert F. Potter, Associate Forester, U. S. Forest Service, made an address before the National Woolgrowers' Association here today and said that the question of meat supply is involved in the methods of grazing used on the national forests. He also made the statement that overgrazed ranges can be improved quicker through use than they could be if they were left idle.

He points out that the forage resources on the national forests represents a valuable asset upon which not only the welfare of the stockmen depends, but that of a large proportion of the people. The task of the government has been to work out a plan which would develop this resource and promote its use to the fullest extent without harming tree growth.

During the first three years of administration, from 1905-7, the problem of the service was to take care of areas which had been badly overgrazed, and a material reduction had to be made in the number of stock grazed before the damage could be stopped. From the very beginning, the forest service invited the cooperation of the stockmen and consulted with them regarding the practicability of the plans which were to be adopted. This cooperation was secured through the various stockgrowers' association and it was so successful that similar associations have grown up among other users of the national forests.

Before range control was put into effect, the feed belonged to the man who got his stock on the land first, though there was no way by which he could hold it except by physical force. Under such a system might made right, and the only thought was to get what feed there was while it lasted. This condition led to serious controversy and out of it grew the range wars which often resulted in loss of life and property. Under the present control, right prevails, and had nothing else been accomplished, Mr. Potter says, the removal of

A Red Letter Event

Putting up a new house, barn or other buildings, is a good deal like getting married—it's a red letter day event that only occurs about once in a lifetime, so you simply can't afford to make a mistake by using "bum" material.

The secret of having good buildings that will last, lies in the selection of the material. No matter how nice a building may LOOK when it is new, if it is built of wet, shaky, knotty lumber it will soon shrink and swell out of shape, and require constant tinkering to keep it in passable shape.

So the sounder and dryer lumber you use, the better will be the results for all time. And as GOOD Lumber costs no more than POOR stuff of the same grade technically, there is nothing saved, even in first cost, by using the poor material.

We sell nothing but GOOD Lumber and Building Material. 'Nuf sed.
