The President and the Peace Agitator.

President Wilson took occasion, in the presence of a number of visitors, to deny that he intended, as a newspaper had reported, to call a world conference to bring about peace.

He characterized the suggestion as impracticable and in line with scores of other impracticable suggestions from various sources. He made plain his opinion that it would be worse than useless to act at present.

The President is right. It is one thing to be earnestly desirous of helping the warring nations to peace and another thing to be eternally rushing in with a suggestion for peace which every one knows those nations are in no temper to accept.

It is one thing to feel that one is the official organ for the unquestioned peace sentiment of this country, as the President undoubtedly is, and quite another thing to try to make oneself the channel for the communication and championship of all the peace plans that are invented.

If this were our quarrel these constant suggestions that the President "do something" would be quite in order. It would be his business to do something, and any occasion would be the right occasion.

But this isn't our quarrel. Our influence is largely dependent on our tact and our ability to see the first favorable opportunity to tender our good offices. As much as we should like, we cannot control events. We can only watch them for a favorable situation. Let the peace societies and peace advocates remember that the President occupies a delicate position and that his usefulness depends on his waiting the time or making timely suggestions and not on his becoming an officious nuisance and a philanthropic busybody in the effort to stop the war.—Chicago Herald.
