Hardly a "German" Reception.

So open to criticism in all its forms are the Germans that they are probably safer from undeserved reproach than any people that ever lived. One cannot help wondering, however—wondering very gently, of course—how the population of Treves could have been expected to give the American troops who entered the city a welcome any different from, or warmer than, the welcome they did give them. Mr. James, who was in Treves for The New York Times when our men marched in, only showed himself the good observer he is when he described the reception they got as impressively unlike the joyful demonstrations made in the liberated towns of France and Belgium, and even in Luxembourg, but really the inhabitants of Treves behaved themselves fairly well, even though they watched the victors in frowning silence.

That silence was not "German"—it was merely human—merely the way in which the inhabitants of any French, English, or American town would have acted if it had been their tragic lot to be the helpless spectators of their private and public affairs by an alien conqueror.

The Germans, too, were depressed by more than the evidence thus forced upon them that they had lost the war—and vastly more besides! In the minds of them all there were vivid memories of what German soldiers had done when they took possession of lands and towns not their own, and, with characteristic German inability to understand other peoples, few of them could have been free from fear that now it was their own turn to endure the ruthless abuse of irresistible military power.
