PICTURESQUE JAPANESE.

Some of Their Queer Customs and Traditions Are Amusing.

According to American standards, writes Edward Walter Dawson in Housekeeping, Japanese women can never be considered beautiful, but they are unfailingly picturesque. For instance, a matron of this Land of the Rising Sun, whose hospitality I often enjoyed, wore a robe of cream colored silk, a kimono of darker shade, fastened with an exquisitely embroidered girdle. These girdles are one of the distinctive features in the dress of the Japanese women. Several yards of material go to the making of them, and there is much significance attached even to the way in which they are tied. Men also wear girdles, or obis, but for them they are much narrower and smaller and serve only the purpose of holding the robe in place. The writer goes on to tell of a marriage ceremony which he was allowed to attend. "A wedding is a wedding the world over." Drinking from the same cup, bride and bridegroom pledged each other to share life's joys and sorrows. "The bridegroom had entered first. The bride soon joined him. A low table was placed before them, on which were cups, bottles and a double spouted vessel, full of sake, a kind of rice beer. On a stand near by were figures of a tortoise, emblem of long life; a fir tree, emblem of strength, and a blooming plum tree, for beauty and profligence. As soon as the guests were seated a stand was placed before each, and a typical Japanese feast was served. During this the bride waited upon her future mother and father-in-law, and at the close she and the bridegroom drank alternately from the double spouted vessel until it was emptied.

"One of the side dishes was boiled chrysanthemum petals, garnished with vinegar sauce; another was mushrooms and cucumbers dipped in honey. Cucumbers are a favorite food in Japan, and, fresh or pickled, they are found on the table the year round. In many ways the Japanese go about things in exactly the opposite way to what we do. For instance, in the building of a house the upper stories and roof are completed on stout scaffolding, and then the first story and foundation are filled in from below. Japanese carpenters draw the plane and saw toward them, instead of pushing from them, as our workmen do. Above the main door of each home is the name of the householder, with the number and sex of the family. The giving of a name in Japan is a ceremony of much importance and does not take place until the child is three or four years old. There is a tradition that babies in the land never cry. Perhaps this is an exaggeration, but in my stay there of many moons I never heard a child's voice raised in distress. These little people themselves have a tradition about their toys that if a doll is properly and affectionately cared for sooner or later it will become alive. Full of legend and quaint superstition is this picturesque home of a picturesque people. On a small rustic bridge which spans one of its sacred rivers, hardly more than a creek, may be seen many women kneeling at different times in the day. They watch intently the mysterious current and from time to time throw bits of paper into its tide. On each of these is a prayer and somewhere out in the unknown the gods are supposed to gather these wretched petitions, and, if the humor urges, grant them."

Hard on the English.

In the time of James II. of Scotland the relations between the Scotch and English were bad indeed. The king objected to any business dealings between the Scotch and their southern neighbors. To his subjects he thought nothing could result therefrom but evil. To preserve them, therefore, from any approach to amity and intercourse with the hated southron he actually decreed outlawry against those who should desire, even in that time of peace, to smooth down the differences which divided the two peoples. Against Englishmen visiting Scotland without leave the law was especially severe. Nor was any Scotsman to be allowed to become security or guaranty for an Englishman under any circumstances whatsoever unless he wished to be accused of high treason. Even legitimate trade was forbidden. No Scotsman was to supply the English garrisons in Berwick or Roxburgh with "any victual, fowl or other supportation" under the pain of treason, while no intermarriage was to be allowed between "the Scotch and English, that men's affections be not led away from their ain kinr."

Apples and Drunkenness.

With the view of learning the opinions of other medical men concerning the efficacy of the taste for liquor a New York city physician corresponded with many medical men living in various states. He received replies from all but three.

From a large majority came answers that they had never known a case where a person was accustomed to the free use of apples and was a drunkard, nor did they ever know of a drunkard who was accustomed to the daily use of apples.

From a personal observation, covering a period of more than twenty-five years, the physician says he never has known a single instance where a person who was a free user of apples acquired the liquor habit, and he has known a person addicted to the free use of liquor who was fond of apples.

Color and Warmth.

The color of materials has some influence on the warmth of the clothing. Black and blue absorb heat freely from without, but white and light shades of yellow, etc., are far less absorbent. This difference can be demonstrated by experiment. The same material, when dyed with different colors, will absorb different amounts of heat. In hot countries white coverings are universally worn, and sailors and others wear white clothing in hot weather.

Climatic Paradox.

It is not generally known that at certain seasons of the year it is warmer in Greenland than in southern Europe. In winter this occurs during the long sunless weeks of the polar regions. The cause which leads to it is not unknown in other countries. Thus in Switzerland a warm dry wind, called the foehn wind, at times blows down from the snow covered mountains in autumn and winter and suddenly melts and carries off the snow, drying up the atmosphere.

It is not generally known that at certain seasons of the year it is warmer in Greenland than in southern Europe.

In the northwestern United States there is a similar wind called the chinook wind. So in Greenland at irregular intervals a warm wind blows down from the snow covered interior, bringing an extensive thaw in January and February. As a result we have the extraordinary fact that during eight consecutive days in November and December in one year it was warmer in Jakobsaavn, in latitude 69 degrees 20 minutes, than in northern Italy. Upernavik, another town of Greenland, was, during part of the time, warmer than the south of France.

The Exact Thing Required for Constipation?

"As a certain purgative and stomach purifier Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets seem to be the exact thing required, strong enough for the most robust, yet mild enough and safe for children and without the terrible griping so common to most purgatives," says R. ### DUTCH FISHER FOLK.

An Interesting People Who Are Fond of Jewelry and Finery.

The presence of any foreigner, Dutch or otherwise, trading or living the life of the people, would not be tolerated for a day in most of the Dutch fishing villages. No person from the mainland has for years taken up his abode on the island of Marken. They intermarry with each other; the priest forbids their marrying within the third degree, and they implicitly obey him. They never marry out of their own village, and this accounts for the extraordinary similarity in their faces. They might all have been cast in the same mold. To those who approach them in a friendly manner the men are as interesting and attractive as the women. Both sexes are singularly good looking, with regular features and blue eyes. The women have beautiful complexions; the men are bronzed by the sun or the sea. At first the latter appear somewhat surly and defiant, but that is generally due to shyness, and they soon become kindly and courteous. They are nearly all teetotalers, their drink being weak tea or coffee, which they take several times a day and on which they seem to thrive, for they are a splendid race. They are very moral and religious. In Friesland there are a number of goldsmiths' shops. When in holiday dress the men almost outshine the women in their love of self adornment. Their shirts are fastened with gold button links and are embroidered with black lines; they wear velvet knee breeches and silver buckles to their shoes, which are often richly chased. In most of the fishing villages the men, when in full dress, wear four great silver buttons. These are often decorated with Scriptural subjects in repoussé. They are enormously proud of their buttons, which are heirlooms from father to son. Most of the Dutch fisher folk are very well to do. They are thrifty and economical, and their wants are few. They have no desire for luxuries. They rarely touch meat, are total abstainers, and this is probably the reason for the high standard of morality, which obtains among them.—Pittsburgh.
