IS MOTHER SHIP FOR SEA PLANES

Atlantic Liner Has Been Transformed Into Sleuth of the High Seas

IT HUNTS SUBMARINES

With Ample Air, Bomb and Torpedo Equipment Former Liner Is Nemesis of Deep

LONDON, Oct. 15.—Strangest looking of all the ships with the British grand fleet is the Atlantic liner which has been transformed into a mother ship for the seaplanes. There are platforms in place of the promenade where passengers used to lounge, bombs in place of deck-quoits, and the dining saloons have been fitted up as workshops. Everything that a seaplane needs in the way of repairs can be supplied.

"Here is our assortment of bombs," said an officer, showing an exhibit of different sizes on a shelf. "That one weighs a hundred pounds, the same as a six inch shell."

A crane that once had taken passengers' trunks out of the hold lifted a seaplane off a platform and deposited it on the water, where it bounced on the waves before the motor was started and it skimmed across the surface for a hundred yards or more, circled around the fleet two or three times, and then disappeared out of sight. With its floats it looked clumsily beside an aeroplane—the difference between a duck and the action of sea warfare.

Most of the romances and the action of sea warfare while the British grand fleet waits for the German fleet to come out are the seaplanes and the destroyers. The dreadnoughts remain in harbor, except for occasional cruises into the North sea but the planes and the destroyers are always on the move. They work together in hunting "Fritz" as British officers and men universally refer to submarines.

Submarines Easily Seen A submarine is visible to an aviator when it is cruising below the surface. It never travels deeper than thirty or forty feet and leaves a characteristic ripple and air-bubbles and streaks of oil.

When a plane has located a submarine it signals the hunters where to go. But before they arrive a squall may have hidden the track. A submarine may be known to be in a certain region and be lost and seen and lost and seen again. Submarine hunting is a tiresome game of hide and seek. Naval ingenuity has invented no end of methods of location and of destruction. Experiment has proved some to be effectual and some useless. Strictest kept of naval secrets these.

Very thin the skin of a submarine and very fragile and complicated its machinery. It does not take much of a shock to put it out of order or a large cargo of explosives to dent that skin beyond repair.

Dive Like Fish Harpooned "The difficulty is to know when you get them," an officer explained, for it is in the nature of the submarine to sink, whether vitally injured or not. It may have gone to the bottom to stay in fifty fathoms of water, or it may have submerged under a choppy sea and made its escape. We have been hunting them for a year, now, and no doubt we are getting the better of them. We have not only learned how to keep them off from our great ships, but how to destroy them."

"If all and bubbles come up for a long time in one place or if they come up with a rush, that is considered fairly good evidence of success. There is no escape for the crew. They cannot make the submarine rise or get out of it. It becomes a steel casket in a watery grave. No nautical mind is required to realize that by casting about on the bottom with a grapnel you will learn if an object with the bulk and weight of a submarine is there, and the "death" of submarines is established in this way.

Guess Work Doesn't Go "The admiralty will not accept any guesswork about it," said an officer. "We may have put an explosive right into one or rammed it in a way that must have broken its back, but that is not proof enough. The report goes down on the chart as 'supposed destroyed.'"

With Admiral Crawford the correspondent of the Associated Press went to see the submarine defenses of a harbor. Cruisers and destroyers and auxiliaries were going and coming, but the narrow openings through which they passed were closed instantly they were by. There was more than one obstruction. If a submarine got past the first or the second, it was in a pocket. Several have been caught in this way.

"Take care! There is a tide here!" the coxswain of the admiral's barge was warned. "We don't want to get caught in a trap meant for Fritz."

At one point the correspondent saw a number of destroyers lying moored to a quay as close together as fish in a basket. They had just come in from a tour at sea.

Here Today; Gone Tomorrow "Here today and gone tomorrow," said an officer. "What a time they had last winter! And they are in for another winter of it. You know how cold the North sea is—no, you cannot unless you have been out in a torpedo boat dancing the tango in the teeth of that bitter wind, with the spray whipping up to the top of the smoke stacks. In the dead of night they would come into this pitch-dark harbor. How they found their way is past me. It's a trick of those young fellows who command."

glad in thick short coats of llama wool, which keep their bodies warm and leave the legs free for movement in keeping footing as the destroyers roll and plunge in a heavy sea.

Sail in the Gloom Every ship on the blockade from Ireland to the British channel is also a part of the system of submarine hunting. They show no lights; there are no lights along the coast at night.

"It gives one an idea of England's maritime resources," said an officer, "when you consider that we have 2,300 trawlers, and other auxiliary ships on voyage."

The trawlers plod over platted seas with the regularity of moving machines cutting a harvest, on their
