IN RIGUE ON THE NILE.

Deep Laid Sch-m's by France, Russia and England in the Sudan. The remark of Le Temps, an official organ of the French government, that the future of the Sudan cannot be left to the caprice of British diplomacy, coupled with the rumor that the two expeditions from the French Congo have joined hands near the headwaters of the Nile, are items of current news that hark back to the origin of that sudden shift of British policy which sent Sir Herbert Kitchener's expedition against the Khalifa in a year of profound peace.

At the time it was difficult to gauge England's motive. Egypt was not in crying need of more territory. The Khalifa's tribes had committed no depredations and had not advanced as far as it had before 1893. Gordon had gone unavenged so long that his name had ceased to be one to conjure with. Considering that Egyptian finances were not wholly in English control, it was deemed extraordinary that Lord Salisbury should enter upon a course which would threaten to deplete them and thus arouse the spirit of resistance among the powers of continental Europe.

It was serious. Great Britain's capable men in Africa had fathomed a French design which, if carried out, would not only have given France control of the sources of the Nile, but of the greater part of the Sudan as well. Already grave concerns had been made. Back of the British, Portuguese and German gold coast settlements and the republic of Liberia the French had acquired a desert territory twice as large as France itself and this had been connected by a broad strip of annexed land with Algeria on the north and the French Congo—another imperial possession—on the southeast, presenting a frontier of about 1,800 miles.

This frontier the French were steadily pushing eastward, their pioneer expeditions coming nearer and nearer the territory, betimes, that Great Britain claims for Egypt.

This, of itself, was a source of alarm to the British when Mensiek, negus of Abyssinia, appointed the friend of France, Henry of Orleans, Count Leon-tief, governor of the equatorial provinces verging on the Nile, lying between Senaar and the British sphere of influence in East Africa. Here was danger from the other side as Leontief's influence would be felt in the French provinces of the Nile, to the French. Plainly the enemies of England were going to close in upon the Khalifa's country and control it.

Gogland had abandoned the ground a dozen years before and was more natural, France argued, than that some other civilized power should step in and complete her work. Not that any such announcement was made, for France went her way as secretly as possible, but the plot certainly thickened and finally took the form of a comprehensive scheme to ruin Egypt as well as to acquire the Sudan.

The first outsider to feel the full significance of the French move was Slatin Pasha, a prisoner in the camp of the Dervish chief. He found out that, if the French should obtain the upper Nile, their first scheme would be, by extensive works of irrigation, to turn its flow into the desert. This would so diminish the volume of water in the main channel that in summer, the lower Nile would be no inundation, such as the planting season in Egypt requires. Should this happen, Slatin will find the French at Khartoum? Probably not, unless the latter have made an offensive and defensive alliance with the Khalifa, which is also unlikely. But the British would be in danger. Already spread the rumor at London that the French are at the Mahdi's capital and has led to an uneasy feeling lest Lord Salisbury may have been outwitted in the present, but the British waited another year; they would have lost all, but the present march seems to have been in time. The whole proceeding shows that Kitchener's conquest will have to be complete.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Cloth of Different Color on Each Side.

An unique idea receives practical realization at the great dyeing plant of Messrs. Brownlow & Stanfield, Leeds, England, in a new and peculiar method by which cloth gets a different shade on each side, the necessity of an extra lining being thus done away with. In this process the cloth or material to be dyed is first dyed through in any shade of color in the usual manner, then finished by the ordinary process, after which it is taken to a printing machine provided with a roller engraved with all over uniformly with diagonal lines, but deeply and running in one direction over its surface, with diagonal lines cut less deeply and running in the other direction. This roller dips into a bath of thickened color of the required shade and carries it up to the cloth, which is by means of the other rollers brought into contact with the dyeing roller; the latter, in order to prevent the color penetrating too deeply, is carefully adjusted in its pressure, and thus more than half way through the piece. Screw levers are also arranged upon each end of the roller for adjusting the pressure. After the second color has been applied the cloth is steamed and finished in the ordinary way.—N. Y. Sun.

"JIM" WILSON, OF THE ALTON.

Jim makes a point to not deviate from the truth when discussing, and one only, that is the excellent advantages of the Chicago and Alton over any of its rivals. All old timers will remember that when Jim came to El Paso he soon gained a name for truth and veracity in railroad matters but upon other subjects—well, never mind the veil of charity shall be drawn right here.

The "great and only" is here for the purpose of inspecting the Sunset Limited trains which use the Al on line between St. Louis and Chicago. Since arriving here he has been very busy instructing "Darby" and "Curt" just how to handle this great train. "Jim" did not leave town by the limited today as his transportation reads, "Not good on the Sunset Limited."
