WASHINGTON LETTER.
Daily Life and Habits of Texas Congressmen at the Capital.
The Gazette's Headquarters—Ingersoll and the Civil Rights Decision.
Sambo's Occupation Gone—The New Cotton Picking Machine.
Correspondence of the Gazette.
Washington, November 1.—Representatives of Texas and most Southern states have their Washington headquarters in the vicinity of the GAZETTE's headquarters. The GAZETTE selected the greatest number of Southern representatives and senators. Northern and Eastern members of congress affect the vicinity of the White House and of the treasury; representatives of the South find dwelling places as near the capitol as possible, and especially are they accustomed to sit about the tables of the Metropolitan hotel. A few Southerners, as did Alex. H. Stephens, still imagine that Washington City is all to be found in the old National hotel, made famous as Henry Clay's abiding place, and as the scene of his death. Ever afterwards when in Washington, and until his demise in Atlanta, Alex. H. Stephens occupied the apartments of Mr. Clay, and I used to think that Mr. Stephens proposed to die just where Henry Clay breathed his last. But now that Mr. Stephens no longer attracts men from all the states to the National, and David Davis has gone off after strange gods, and Judge Reagan has found that his constituents and colleagues most approve the cuisine of the Metropolitan, and there he would meet many wanderers from the Gulf states—even Judge Reagan, ordinarily as immovable as Pike's peak, was transported during the last session to the Metropolitan. He is anchored there forever. There, too, Culberson, Wellborn, Reagan, Coke and all the rest sat about their tables assigned to Texas and there each evening did newsgatherers, representing the few Southern papers having correspondents here, busy themselves in buttonholing and buzzing representatives of the South.

A SINGULAR VISION.
[Denton Monitor.]
About two months ago, Mr. Louis E. Mossier, book-keeper in the lumber yard of C. C. Bell, of this city, about midnight, while wide awake, lying upon his bed, witnessed a singular phenomenon. Upon what seemed to be a rough, dirty floor, he saw C. C. Scruggs wounded in machinery, in a stooping posture, bleeding and writhing in pain, and ultimately disappear through the wall. This vision bearing upon his mind, he hunted for Judge Scruggs the next day, but as the judge was sick at home, he failed to find him. But the next day, he saw the judge, and related to him his vision, and urged him to be cautious. Subsequently, he repeated his warning, but the judge treated the matter lightly, and told Mr. Mossier that he was superstitious. When the judge was afterwards caught in his gin and had his arm lacerated, Mr. M. visited him at his residence, and reminded him of the warning he had given him. The judge replied "Yes, it is just as you told me." Mr. M. then described his vision in the presence of Judge Scruggs, Mrs. Scruggs, J. R. Burton and George Wilson the grocer. It was a singular coincidence, to say the least, and has occasioned a great deal of astonishment and speculation among those aware of the circumstances.

WHIPPING A WOMAN.
[Fannin County Advocate.]
Quite a stir was created in the Warren neighborhood several days ago by reason of a horse-whipping affair in that place. It seems that a woman named Mollie Williams, a recent arrival in that neighborhood, met two of Mr. Beckham's daughters in one of them, charging her with having spread evil reports as to her character. Beckham was away from home at the time this happened, and when he heard of it went with his two daughters to the house where Mrs. Williams was stopping, and a regular row ensued, resulting in the two giving Mrs. Williams a severe whipping with a blacksnake whip. Upon an investigation being made by McQueen at Slavy, Beckham and his daughters were fined $47.65.

the inhuman traffic at once and Ingersoll's fathers voted to protract it twenty years that they might get out of the business without loss. It was during these twenty years that Ingersoll's fathers fastened the institution upon the country, and when Ingersoll's state finally discovered that its peculiar crops required only three or four months, service of slaves, and that it cost less to hire than to own labor, Ingersoll's fathers enacted prospective emancipation laws, under the operation of which they sold their slaves to Virginia and the South. They coolly pocketed the money and then began the row to rob the new owners of their slaves and of their property. They have done it, and never refunded a penny, and boast of the dishonesty, while of course they do hate those they have robbed, and it is this hatred of Southern whites, rather than love of blacks, which animates Ingersoll and his followers in discussing the extinction of the negro civil rights law. He repeats his speech on this subject, and all Africa in Washington howls and prostrates itself before Bob Ingersoll and Ben Butler. The latter statesman is as unlike Ingersoll in moral qualities, as was Medusa in physical charms unlike Venus. Ingersoll's moral and personal qualities and impulses are as admirable as his religious and political faiths are abhorrent to the multitude, and therefore it is argued that "faith" doesn't make the man. It only shapes the angel, and Bob and Ben are a delicious pair of them.

A PROPER THING FOR BOB AND BEN.
But I was going to remark that the repeal of the "cotton patch" by the South Carolina who picks, with a horse and a machine, two and a half bales of cotton per diem, is a revolution wrought involving infinitely more deeply the fortunes of races in America than the beneficent action of the supreme court. Ingersoll is generally in error. No court ever did a people a greater service than when the civil rights bill was annulled and simply became legal distinctions were thus obliterated. People might have forgotten differences of color and habits and peculiarities, but the law would not suffer it and society was in a perpetual state of revolt and Sambo was the sufferer. The supreme court has put a period to this condition of Southern social life, and now comes this inventor who utterly obliterates the "cotton patch." Never was such a blow delivered. Sambo crushed by it. Twenty negroes lose employment for each one henceforth given tasks as "cotton pickers." How infinitely cheaper than ever before becomes labor in the South! Cotton mills must rise up in the midst of these redundant cotton fields. Massachusetts is undone. Lowell and Lawrence must be transferred to Birmingham, Memphis, Atlanta and Fort Worth. This cotton-picking machine makes negro labor cheaper than that of the poor girls of the mills of the East, and the wealth and industry and machinery of the East must be transferred to the South. Sambo as a slave enriched New England; Sambo as a freeman will destroy New England—just wait and see, and Bob, Ingersoll, if a practical rather than a sentimental philosopher, would discuss this aspect of the irrepressible negro question.

THE PRESS.
The Republican newspapers are vainly employed in gathering up instances of cruelty to negroes and it seems that the bloody shirt banner will be the standard of the Republicans in 1884. But Emory Speer has consigned the last of the Ku-Klux to the Georgia penitentiary and this will put a period to the vice.

THE COUNTRY KEEPS UP.
[Breham Banner.]
Fort Worth is improving rapidly and real estate is constantly advancing in price. This is all very well and looks fine for those interested, but there is such a thing as building up a town or city far in advance of the territory surrounding it; when that is the case the march of improvement calls a halt; prices of property depreciate and several years elapse in waiting for the country to catch up with the town. It is the country that makes cities, not cities that make the country, as some people who live in town imagine. Fort Worth is now a good town and a prosperous place, but she may over-do herself. Such things have been done in the past and may be done in the future. There is such a thing as making haste slowly, but Fort Worth may over-reach herself in trying to over-shadow her old rival, Dallas.
