Said he: "When I see how little regard many of our laboring men have for their duty towards their employers, I cannot much blame capitalists for refusing to recognize our labor organizations. I am a Knight of Labor myself. and have the highest respect for our order, and know that its aims and purposes are good. Yet I am sorry to have to admit that we have many members who fall to realize their honest duty to their employers. They are too prone to regard employer and employe as in antagonistic attitudes towards one another. They seem to think it not only justifiable but their duty to do just as little work as they possibly can to retain their jobs and draw their pay. They will watch the foreman like a hungry hawk or preacher watching a fat pullet, and when they know he is not looking they will scarcely do as much work in an hour as they should do in twenty minutes. When I am at work, whether for an individual or a corporation, I never think about the presence of the 'boss.' I had just as Hef have him around every minute in the day as not. I draw pay for ten hours' work, and I endeavor to give full value for the same. Sometimes one of these shirks says to me: 'Look here, you are putting in too much work. Remember, you are not working for an individual, but a soulless corporation, and nobody expects you to kill yourself for it.' I don't expect to kill myself either, at least not by overwork, but I do expect to give the com-pany an honest day's labor every day 1 am in their employ; just as I should expect a man to do for me if I had him nired by the day. I care nothing for the good or bad opinions of these shirks any way. I only do my duty towards the railroad company that employs me, and expect it to do the same by me. The company has always done this, and even more; for on several occasions it has
