FALL TIME.
When the frost is on the pumpkin and the green is off the grass,
When the cider's in the barrel and the apple's in the sack,
When the Tom and Jerry's howling and the book is off the beer,
You can bet a large simoleon that the hazy fall is near.

When the hammock's off the porchlet and the melon's off the vine,
When the chipmunk's in his quarters and the paint is off the sign,
When the Jover's off the gatepost and the leaves are on the ground,
It is safe to bet your money that the fall has come around.

When the bee is off the flower and the flea is off the dog,
When the seed's in the appendix and the duck is on the bog,
When Gawgie's on the avenue with his chrysanthemum,
You can wager double eagles that the smoky fall has come.

AWFUL RACKET.

Many Thought Their Heaters Had Exploded—Probably an Earthquake.

At 5 o'clock this morning there was a tremendous report. Nearly every citizen who possessed a steam or hot water heater hid himself to his collar, cock sure that the whole shabden had been blown to smithereens.

Houses shook, dishes rattled, beds rocked like cradles, and nervous people trembled like the Filipinos when Dewey began firing camp-kettles at them.

Nobody was able to locate the ruction, and finally all concluded that it was a genuine earthquake, all wool and a dozen yards wide.
