PULLEY BURSTED.

And No Incandescent Lights For Some Ten Days to Come.

For two nights users of incandescent lamps have been in the fix of old man Moses when the light went out.

Inquiry of the Chief Scientist at the Electric Plant developed the following unfortunate state of affairs.

Sunday evening everything was moving with dove-tailed smoothness, and Albert Hill and Frank Bromley each wore ten cent smiles; all at once there was a kerfloo; the flipper-jinny had caromed on the fillamere-water, the jimhammer shot shaft the 18-karat hoodoo-walloper, and without further notification the propelling whirllintwister which had been circumambient suddenly became circumfarcaceous—and the jig was up.

This is a concise statement of the case from a purely scientific standpoint.

But, in plain United States, the big pulley which drives the incandescent dynamo bursted, pieces flying in all directions, fortunately hurting no one and doing but slight damage to the building.

It is necessary to send to St. Louis for a new pulley and it will be a week or ten days before the lights are on again.

ST. FRANCES DE SALES.

This Old and Popular Academy Will Begin Its Fall Session Monday, Sept. 11th. With a Full Corps of Teachers.

The Sisters of St. Frances de Sales Academy will open their school September 11th, 1899. The Sisters will make every effort to maintain the high standard of education, ethical and physical culture, which this Academy has sustained from its establishment in our city.

Teachers of excellence, experience and ability will be employed in every department. Modern and practical methods of instruction will be used and every care bestowed to make the Academy healthy and pleasant, homelike and enjoyable.

Special attention will be given to every branch of study, and to meet these requirements Mother Borgia has fortunately secured three teachers of experience and ability from St. Frances de Sales Academy in New York, one of whom has enjoyed an enviable reputation as teacher of music in that city, and will take charge of the vocal and instrumental department.

The literary course comprises the best American and English authors and will be under the charge of a thorough and experienced teacher, who will also instruct in composition, letter writing and the cultivation of the conversational powers. The course of study has been carefully revised to meet the full requirements of the education of young ladies. In the primary department care will be taken to train the perceptive faculties to a quick and correct observation; in the Junior department the powers of reflection and reason will be trained and prepared to enter the senior department, where the higher branches will be taught in connection with all that cultivates, grace and accomplishes a lady's education and deportment.

The Sisters cordially invite patrons who have young ladies to educate to send to the Director of the Academy for their prospectus and examine their course of study and their rates of charges, assuring parents and guardians that they will use every effort to faithfully educate and carefully look after the health, comfort and deportment of pupils entrusted to their care and instruction.

During the Civil War, as well as in our late War with Spain, diphtheria was one of the most troublesome diseases the army had to contend with. In many instances it became chronic and the old soldiers still suffer from it. Mr. David Taylor of Wind Ridge, Greene county, Pa., is one of these. He uses Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy and says he never found anything that would give him such quick relief. It is for sale by J. Jas. Wood & Son, Druggists.

NOW IN FLORENCE

Rev. A. T. Ennis Writes Entertainingly From There.

THE WORLD'S FAMOUS PAINTERS

FLORENCE, August 1st, 1899.

Editor Maysville Ledger: If we desire to study works of art and to understand the spirit of a particular school we must visit the very place where a set of artists have lived and dreamed and impressed on the painted canvases the ideals floating before their minds.

Single productions scattered far and apart in various galleries will never enable the student to form an adequate idea of the merits that distinguish great masters.

Accustomed by such convictions I leisurely wandered through the smiling plains and verdant hills of Umbria, under whose genial skies the fire of inspiration directed the pencil of genius. This province of Italy gave birth to, and was consecrated by, the presence of Francis of Assisi, that tender-hearted and loving saint celebrated in song and story. In the rustling of the leaves, kissed by the amorous winds, and in the murmuring of the rills, laughing among the moss-covered rocks, the pilgrim seems to hear the sighs of that ecstatic soul enamoured of the beauty of God. The Ode to Creation hymned by Francis centuries ago forms one of the precious gems of early Italian literature composed long before Dante touched the strings of his Florentine harp. The deeds of the simple Friar of Assisi are handed down by the song of the Umbrians and by the pencil of their immortal painters.

The attentive student of the development of art in the sunny land laved by two seas cannot fail to observe the influence which this humble Monk exercised in his country at the end of the fourteenth and at the beginning of the fifteenth century. At that period Florence drew her inspiration in painting from the study of ancient models, aiming exclusively at the external reproduction of classic beauty, cold and majestic, from which any spiritual ideal was sadly excluded. Fra Angelico had already entered a protest against this tendency by those sublime works that the world is never tired of admiring. With him, however, the Italian painting of the Renaissance had only its point of departure. It was reserved to the Umbrian school to accentuate the necessity of uniting sentiment and romance with the imitation of nature and the story of the classics.

The religious and spiritual environment of Umbria served to intensify such conception of the art of painting—a conception lauded to the very sky and deemed worthy of imitation by our modern pre-Raphaelites. Francis and his life appeared like a vision to the rivals of Florence and Venice. Temperament complemented the strength of intuition, and a mighty turn was given to the current that threatened to make for the errors of paganism humanists. The school of Umbria rose in the first half of the fifteenth century. Its main characteristics being the introspection of the soul, it set to work to express on canvas forms breathing celestial longings, and a tenderness bearing the stamp of the divine. Piero della Francesca, Bonifazio Florence and the great Alunno drew the pencil animated by a peculiar mode of thought, which by degrees developed the idealizing habit. Perugino and Pinturicchio soon carried to the uttermost perfection the qualities exogitated by their predecessors. The Umbrian school fell later on into a kind of mannerism and decline, if decline it may be called, and not evolution, but it had the honor of forming that prince of artists—the immortal Raphael.

I am hastily penning down these reflections at my hotel in Perugia after a day of rambling through the quiet city. The Church of St. Francis, adorned with many works of art, produced a great impression on me whilst in Assisi. The Monk who kindly took me around pointed out with pride to the frescoes of Giotto who painted the four virtues practiced by the Saint—Poverty, Chastity, Obedience and Glorification. These figures fully justify the praise accorded to the father of Italian painting for having substituted to symbol individuality perfectly humanized and naturally idealized. Verily they are allegories, not abstractions, but allegories strong and precise as his friend Dante might have conceived them. The Church is rich in other artistic works produced by local artists, for Giotto had only come to Assisi to seek an inspiration he could not find in Florence. These works are marked with a perfection that appealed to my heart and soul.

Leaving Assisi, the city of meditation and thought, yesterday I arrived in Perugia. My first visit was made to the old house once tenanted by Pietro Vannucci, known as "St. Perugino." Within those walls the master worked and established a fraternity of artists such as Perugino, Pinturicchio and Aliphan. Raphael also was among them. As I stood in a small garden at the back of the building I evoked the figures of Perugino and Raphael walking arm in arm through the little aisles, exchanging their ideas about the divine art. The pupil was destined to achieve what the master only dreamt to do. The Cathedral, the Cambio or municipal palace, and the galleries possess some of the best works produced by earnest men whose object was the expression of a mystic ideal blending with nature and classicism.

To enjoy the charm and to find a key to the secret of the Umbrian style of painting the tourist must come here. The environments attune the mind and predispose the senses for the reception of sensations impossible to be felt elsewhere. Even the grace of the landscape and the delicate tints of the atmosphere are reproduced in the background of noble compositions in front of which live and move and have their being spiritualized figures that, like the mystic ladder seen by sleeping Israel, bind heaven to earth.

Florence will be the next resting place in my long homeward journey. A. T. ENNIS.
