

Poetry and the Barbarian.

To her fell the care of the tea-table.
 "Will you have a cup of tea?" she asked, with that far away look in her eyes, expressive of anything rather than the administration of course creature comforts. The robust barbarian assented. A cup of warm tea on a cold winter's afternoon was a pleasant prospect. Poetry led the way to the table. Looking back over her shoulder as she went, and speaking to the youth in the corner, she said:

"The divine ethos!"

As she spoke a radiant smile came over her face—a smile that had been hired to express spiritual illumination and the consciousness of priesthood.

"Do you take sugar?" she asked sweetly, in preparation for her hospitality.

The robust barbarian answered: "No; no sugar, thank you."

Poetry held the tea-pot in her hand, poised in mid air—the tea unpoured.

"The grand sublimity of Dante marched with the lovely tenderness of Petrarca," she said again over her shoulder to the youth in the corner.

"Do you take sugar?" she then asked the robust barbarian kindly.

"No; no sugar, thank you," this latter answered.

Poetry poured out the tea. During the process she said, with great sweetness and touching hospitality:

"I may give you sugar?"

"No; no sugar, thank you," was the reply.

The tea poured out, Poetry took up the milk jug.

"The many-sidedness of Shakespeare and the perfect form of Goethe," she said again over her shoulder to the youth in the corner.

To the robust barbarian, "Sugar?"

"No," said the robust barbarian, quickly.

Poetry poured out the milk. Still holding the cup she looked back to the youth in the corner.

"And add to this transcendent whole the stately march of Spenser," she said. "This is what the true poet should be—and this is what you will some day be." On which she hastily shoveled in two spoonfuls of crushed sugar and handed the cup to the robust barbarian, with a charming smile.

"You take sugar, I think?" she said, very sweetly. "I hope I have made it sweet enough."—Home Journal.

Alone in the Dark.

Reginald DeMugg stood alone on the steps of the handsome mansion, the door of which had just slammed in his face, and in his ears still rang the last words of the fair being whom he madly loved. They were: "Go, and never let me see your face again. You have no style about yourself." And as Reginald stood there under the silent stars, he bitterly repented the act that had left him out in the cold in both senses of the phrase. Through the long summer, through the fall, as the winds waiting with them the first breath of winter, had kissed the leaves and left them nodding with a thousand golden hues, through the winter thus far, he had been as a willing slave of the proud beauty, Madeline Stumy, proud in her own womanly beauty, and proud of the position her father's wealth gave to her. And had she not looked coldly on Reginald, and already had their friends coupled their names, and the preachers who saw them meandering together thought of probable fat marriage fees. And now all was lost, and Reginald might never hope to see that fair face again, never hope to feel the soft, responsive presence of those fairy fingers, and as we said, bitterly did he repent, and what had Reginald done?

He had called to take Madeline to a party in the next block and had not brought a hack?

And Madeline was not that kind of a hairpin, but had to have a hack if a party was only in the next block. And Reginald did not know this. Hence the slamming of the door, and the speech, and the standing alone under the silent stars.—Evansville Argus.
