THEY PASS ME BY.

They pass me by, these friends of mine; I plod along my humble way. I see their lifted faces shine With high ambition's lofty ray.

They pass me by with kindly word, With hands outstretched to help me climb, The pulses of my life are stirred.

But some day, when the angel Death Unlocks the prison house for me, I, too, shall catch the Heavenly breath

MISS BEECHER'S JOURNEY.

An Exciting Story of a Chicago Girl's Trip to the Maine Woods.

MISS MAUD BEECHER was a Chicago girl. She came to Boston on a visit to her cousin, Miss Teresa Holland, a girl with a fad, and that fad was old historic houses, of which Miss Teresa had made a large number of photographs.

The two cousins did not find themselves very congenial and Maud soon tired of wheeling through the historic parts of Massachusetts in search of the most tumble-down houses there.

She got on better with Tom Holland and often begged him to take her wheeling with the other "fellows." Tom was 17 and he found his cousin very amusing.

At last Tom and the other fellows went to the Maine woods for a hunting trip, Mrs. Holland and the younger children left for their seaside home, and Maud and Teresa were left alone in the great city house.

She repeated her rash offer as the hot summer days came on, but Teresa protested that it was cooler in the library of the big city house than on the piazza of the beach house, where the glaring sand reflected in one's face, or in the Maine woods, where mosquitoes and black flies made life miserable.

Maud curled up in a big leather chair and read till her head ached, then she spent long hours doing her hair different ways, and trying on different costumes, to see if one might not be a trifle cooler than the others.

When Teresa announced that she had decided to write an article on photographic art studies before going away, Maud walked out of the room without a word.

Teresa was surprised an hour later when Maud appeared with her traveling bag in her hand. She wore a covert cloth skirt and a silk shirt waist. She had fastened a costly diamond pin in her hair, and another in her breast, to hold in her watch with its jeweled pendant. On her fingers were many rare gems.

"Well," exclaimed Teresa, "where now?" "To the Maine woods to see Tom," Maud replied, gayly. Teresa dropped her pen in dismay.

"Going to see Tom," she ejaculated, "and wearing all those jewels! Really, Maud, I shall have to telegraph mamma if you insist on this wild prank. Come, I'll give up this article and go with you to the beach if you wish. I thought you were quite contented."

"No, Teresa, I will not let you sacrifice your precious article. I am quite determined to go fishing with the boys. Don't be a goose, Teresa; let me go. Mrs. Burridge is up there cooking for the boys. I shall be chaperoned all right. It's no worse than wheeling with them all over Massachusetts."

face. Wheeling in her chair she encountered them. They were gray, unpleasant eyes, and they did not drop before hers, but their owner smiled boldly.

She turned quickly away and buried herself in a newspaper. The eyes still followed her and she ventured to turn toward them again and pretended to fall asleep, thus gaining an opportunity to study the offender through half-shut eyes.

"Probably wants to flirt," she thought, angrily. "Well, I'm not that kind," and she involuntarily tossed her head. Again the man smiled.

Just then an older man with a smooth, hard face joined him, and both began to talk earnestly, frequently glancing across at Maud as though she were the subject of their talk. At last she could endure it no longer, and beckoned to the conductor.

"Those men," pointing directly at them, "are annoying me very much by their boldness." "I am very sorry," returned the polite conductor. "I will see that it does not happen again." And he moved toward the young man.

The elder man rose as the conductor crossed the car and engaged him in a conversation which Maud could not hear, but the conductor glanced back at her several times, and she knew there was some mystery. She would have shrieked aloud could she have heard what the cool stranger was saying about her.

"The young lady is my niece," he said, "and this young man's sister. She has been insane for some months, though quite harmless and quiet. At last her mind became so deranged that we decided to take her to a quiet little camp in the woods. Her mother is there already waiting for her. She likes to fancy herself traveling alone, so we humored her by getting seats over here and letting her pay for her seat. It is one of her fancies to pretend not to know us. Her brother has smiled at her several times, hoping to get some sign of recognition. Poor fellow! He is very fond of her. I suppose we ought to have told you when we got on, but we hoped she would take the journey quietly. I assure you we will get off if she is troublesome," and he sighed deeply.

"Sad case!" murmured the conductor, and moved away. Dr. Herman Aldrich was in the smoker at the time of the above interview, but when the conductor came through he stopped sociably and told him of the case.

Dr. Aldrich was a warm friend of the Hollands, but had never met Teresa's cousin Maud. Had he dreamed who she was his interest would have been more than professional. As it was he hurried his cigar and went back to his seat, which was next to Maud's. He looked long at the girl's regular profile, and at last she turned her clear eyes full on him.

In some way, best known by the man who professed to be her uncle, nearly all the people in the car had become acquainted with the story of the insane lady, and wherever she turned she met curious or pitying glances.

She grew more and more nervous, and at last her composure gave way. Rising, she was about to pass down the car to the ladies' room, where she could be free from these annoyances and think what was best to be done.

She had taken only a step or two when the elder man was by her side. He laid his hand firmly on her arm. "Mattie," he said, "you had better sit right down."

At that moment there is no doubt but what Maud Beecher acted insane. She tore herself away from the man and commanded him to let her pass. She swore her name was not Mattie, and glaring wildly round the car, besought them all to save her from these wretches. She begged to know if an American lady could not travel alone without being attacked by ruffians.

"Will nobody help me?" she cried, and, looking about, saw everyone gazing pityingly at her, but not one started to her assistance. One woman fainted, another had hysterics and the little conductor bustled up officiously and said, quite loud enough for Maud to hear: "She seems to be getting violent. We are near Green Pond station, and I think you will have to get off here."

"What!" she cried, "do you think I am crazy? Oh, my God!" And, sinking into her chair, she buried her face in her hands.

As the train slowed up the two men took her by the arm and commenced dragging her down the aisle. She fought them inch by inch, but they were strong men and she a slight girl of 20; so they had her at the door when the train stopped. Suddenly her face brightened.

"O, there's Tom Holland—Tom! Tom!" she cried, struggling with renewed energy.

him quite equal to the occasion, but nevertheless it was awkward, and he swore softly under his breath as he carried Maud's limp form into the little station house.

The station master brought him a mug with some whisky in it, and he succeeded in bringing Maud back to consciousness. She sat up crying and looking wildly about her. Finding her dress loosened at her throat she clutched wildly at her jewels, and finding all safe she looked in the faces of the doctor and the station master.

"Who are you?" she cried. "You are not the ones who carried me off." Then she called for Tom repeatedly, and sobbed out that if she had taken Teresa's advice she would never have come to this.

The doctor tried to reassure her, but she would not be comforted. So he sent the station master to find some one who was willing to drive them to Tom's camp.

The doctor was far from comfortable. No doubt this girl knew the Hollands but she might be crazy, nevertheless. Her actions were suspicious enough. Perhaps Tom Holland would not thank him for bringing this girl to the camp. Two hours later the question was settled for him. They overtook Tom driving in and surprised him greatly. He had never received the doctor's letter saying he was coming, and of course Maud's advent was a surprise.

Explanations passed on both sides, and Maud's shaken nerves began to quiet down. Mrs. Burridge put her to bed as soon as they reached the camp, and the doctor sent up a dose of bromide.

Two days later Miss Teresa Holland arrived. Her mother's advice had been: "Go up to camp and look after Maud yourself." Teresa found Maud very well taken care of when she arrived. She was swinging in Tom's hammock, while Dr. Aldrich read aloud.

The girls stayed two weeks and brought a new and happy change into camp, Teresa finding plenty to admire in old trees and rocks, developed into a very pleasant companion, and she could out-tramp any of them.

Maud was a good deal changed by her unhappy experience. She started quickly if any unexpected sound was heard, and she never went out of sight of some of the campers. This being her condition, Dr. Aldrich found it necessary to look after her very carefully.

One night, near the end of their stay, Maud and the doctor were strolling on the shore not far from the cabin, and both were strangely silent. Finally Maud spoke in a low and intense voice: "Supposing, doctor, you hadn't been there? Tom would never have heard me. He wasn't watching the train at all."

It was the first time he had let her talk of her fright, for it agitated her. "I was thinking of another supposition," he said. "Supposing you should go back to Chicago, as you have planned to do, next month, what a blank you would leave behind you! Then, again, suppose you should let me join you there in the fall, and suppose you should come back with me and let me take care of you always. I love you, Maud," he finished, simply.

"Well," she answered, "supposing I should."—Boston Globe.

BOSTON'S LONE FISHERWOMAN She Fishes Day After Day, Not for Pleasure, But for Fish, and She Gets Them.

Boston has a lone fisherwoman. The many hundreds of passengers on the ferries for some time have seen her sitting, man fashion, on the end of an East Boston wharf holding a fishing line expectantly in her hand and with her eyes fixed on the water directly beneath her. She scarcely ever looks up and seems indifferent to the stares of the people on the passing boats.

She enjoys the distinction of being the only woman among the many fishermen who fringe the edges of Boston's wharves from sunrise until sunset. She comes to the wharf almost daily at an early hour with a small basket. She does not go home to dinner, but eats a light luncheon which she brings with her. Fishing is by no means simply a pleasure with her. To a reporter she said her fishing partly supported herself and her two little children.

"I am not ashamed of my occupation," she went on to say. "All kinds of weather finds me on the wharf. In the morning I take care of the house and send the children to school, and then I come down on the wharf and fish. I never suffer any annoyance. The men who cast their lines from the wharf treat me with the greatest respect.

"How much do I get for my fish? Well, that depends. Sometimes I get as high as three cents apiece for good-sized flounders. My neighbors are my best customers."
