Burning Flue.

Tuesday evening the fire laddies answered a call to the residence of Capt. Ed. Spears, on High street. It proved to be a burning flue, which was extinguished with no damage.

In Kentucky.

His last hour was approaching. He was dying. The friendliness of the undertakers alone was proof of this. The preachers, also, were entirely too solicitous about his past life. It seemed to him that they were collecting such facts as could be made public in a funeral sermon without more than ordinarily violating the proprieties of the occasion. And yet the invalid did not seem to be disturbed. Death, apparently, had no terror for him. His tranquility alarmed the colored attendant, who had constituted himself his spiritual adviser as well, and the following conversation took place:

"Ole Massa, is yo' easy in yo' min'?"
 "Never more so."
 "An' yer not scart about whar you gwine?"
 "Not at all."
 "Duz yer know whar you is gwine?"
 "No; but that don't annoy me."
 "Don't noy you! Why, ole Massa, you 'sprise me!"
 "Well, you see, I've been married seven or eight times—I forget which—I keep no record of trifles."
 "Yes, Massa."
 "And I'll have good company in either place."
