TARRYTOWN'S CENTENNIAL.

The Critical Moment of the American Revolution.

In the month of September, 1780, the prospects of the independence of the thirteen colonies of America were not encouraging. More than five years had elapsed since the outbreak of the war, and the American arms had as yet gained but a single important victory, that of Saratoga, which had been chiefly due to the unexampled valor of Major-General Benedict Arnold.

The other leading battles or sieges of the war had been either decided British victories like the battles of Long Island, Washington at Heights, Brandywine, Germantown, Charleston and Camden, or indecisive engagements like Mifflin Hill and Monmouth, while the undoubted American success, such as Bennington, Trenton, Princeton and Stony Point had been on a comparatively small scale. It was very doubtful whether an actual majority of the citizens of the thirteen colonies had ever been in favor of independence, and there could be no question that the bitter experience of five years of financial ruin, legislative incompetence and military failures had turned the scale in favor of peace with England upon the best attainable terms.

A GLOOMY PROSPECT.
Washington had confessed under his own hand more than a year before that the American cause was "on the brink of destruction," and since then the greater part of the Southern States had been lost to the unsuccessful advance of Cornwallis. True, an alliance had been effected with France, and war had been declared upon England by Spain and Holland, but the latter two Powers rendered no direct aid to the struggling colonies, and France had long been considered a decidedly enemy of the colonies for the mass of the people to place any implicit confidence in the loyalty of her friendship. It was instinctively and correctly felt that France could only be animated by a desire of revenge against Great Britain, that her aims in America would be directed to a re-conquest of Canada and the Ohio Valley and assuring for herself the control of the fisheries. Rather than submit to the vassalage of the hereditary enemy many patriots felt that it would be advisable to come to terms with the mother country. England, for her part, was in a conciliatory mood and had offered by her commissioners reconciliation far more favorable than the demands of the American patriots themselves at the outbreak of the war. These facts, while they cannot palliate the treason of General Arnold to his flag and his honor as a soldier, go far to explain how it was possible that an intelligent man, who had been a fervent patriot, could in September, 1780, consider the cause of independence as so far corrupted that he expected to terminate the war by his perfidious act and could hope to exert a decisive influence upon his countrymen by his proclamations and addresses.

The career of General Arnold had been, in a military sense, the most brilliant of any officer. There is no record of any defeat or dishonor in his patriotism at the outset and up to within a short period of his treason. Nor need it be questioned while the immediate incentive to his crime was the sense of bitter personal wrong done him by the Continental Congress and by a clique of envious military rivals, he would never have taken the fatal step which has forever blighted his name and fame had he not believed that the cause of American independence was a lost cause. Benedict Arnold was not a fool. He had no intention of forfeiting his American citizenship, and doubtless believed that upon the expected re-establishment of peace upon the basis of colonial self-government, as offered by the British Commissioners, his violation of military honor would be hailed as the General Monk of this modern restoration. The unpardonable sin of Arnold was the employment of probate means for hastening an end which he believed to be inevitable.

A NATION'S FATE IN THE BALANCE.
Had Major Andre not been arrested by the three "skinner" of Westchester, and had he carried out his projected delivery of the secret to Sir Henry Clinton, it is exceedingly probable that the war of American independence would have resulted in failure for the colonies. Nothing succeeds like success. Had Arnold's plans not been frustrated the United States would have remained another score or two of years under the nominal rule of Britannia, and so to speak, the existing effects this denouement would have had upon the course of the French Revolution and its consequent wars? It is probable that the career of Napoleon Bonaparte would never have been run.

He belonged to a party of seven residents of the vicinity who had started out that morning to watch for cattle being driven toward New York. The expedition had been proposed the day before by John Yerks, of Mount Pleasant, who personally engaged John Paulding, John Dean, James Warner and Abram Williams, taking out permit from the officer in command at the neighboring village of North Salem. Paulding engaged his friend Isaac Van Wart, and on their way to Tarrytown they were joined by David Williams, a cousin of Van Wart. The seven men separated into two parties. Yerks with three others posting themselves between the two roads on the top of the hill now known as Mount Andre, and Paulding, Van Wart and Williams taking their position by the brook as above mentioned. It has been asserted that these men were "skinner" or Continental marauders; but there is abundant evidence to the contrary. Paulding was between ten and eleven o'clock on Saturday morning, September 23, 1780, when Andre came up with these three men. Paulding jumped up and presented his firelock at the breast of the traveller, calling to him to stand, and asking which way he was bound. Paulding had been in the Continental service, had been captured by the British and had made his escape from the New York Sugar House in the dress of a German yager only three days before. This dress he still wore and his circumstances led Andre to suppose him a British partisan. He accordingly said, "Gentlemen, I hope you belong to our party." "Which party?" replied Andre. "The lower party," replied Andre. Paulding replied in the affirmative, and Andre proceeded to say that he was a British officer engaged on particular business, and hoped he would not be detained a minute. He pulled out his handsome watch, as if to corroborate his assertion. Paulding then told him to dismount, on which he said, with a forced laugh, "My God, I must do anything to get along," and presented Arnold's pass to John Anderson to pass all guards to White Plains and below. He was forced to dismount, and, against his earnest protest of being on important business for General Arnold, was taken into the bushes and ordered to take off his outer clothing. A close examination of his clothes and person was made, but no papers found. He was then told to put on his boots, which he did very reluctantly, and inside his stockings were found three papers wrapped up. There were three more in the other stocking. Paulding hurriedly glanced at the papers, saw that they were plans and returns of the fortifications of West Point, and exclaimed, "My God, he is a spy!" Andre was then told to dress, and while doing so offered his captors his horse, saddle, bridle, watch and 100 guineas to be allowed to proceed. The boy Williams was inclined to ask questions as to how much money he would give and in what manner; but Paulding at once said, "No, not for the surrender of West Point, but for a high overcoat and a tight colored body coat, the buttonholes lined with gold lace, with manken waistcoat and breeches and a round hat. He was conducted to North Castle, before Lieutenant Colonel Jameson, and the captors went away without even telling their names to Anderson. Andre was sent with an escort to the handwriting of Arnold, and with extraordinary obtuseness determined to send the prisoner to Arnold, under a paper with a letter stating that some papers "of a dangerous tendency" had been found on him and had been forwarded to General Washington. Andre had already been sent forward in command, returned from White Plains in the evening and was filled with astonishment that Jameson should not have suspected Arnold's fidelity. At Tallmadge's earnest request Jameson ordered the prisoner to be brought back, but insisted on the letter being sent to Arnold.
