BEULAH.

BY GUY R. READ.

Jasper Alston kept a cross roads store in a spruce inhabited part of Tennessee. He was rather fat old fellow, a condition doubtless brought about by his close association with butter, lard and axle grease for every other man in the neighborhood was lean with that lardness so characteristic of the Southern backwoodsman.
The most striking of Jasper's characteristics was his love for his daughter Beulah, a handsome girl whose name had been taken from an absurdly romantic, not to say flamboyant, novel, which, years ago, had found its way into the neighborhood. Beulah, however, was not so romantic as her fictitious namesake, unless a certain vein of violence can be regarded as romance, for standing about on log killing day, watching the red glow of an exploding saw, and indeed, I have been told that she once killed a dog with number six shot and then laughed gleefully at his death-inspiring howl.
One day a fellow named Jim Buck, a pretended farmer, an actual slouch and lanket of the oak, entered Jasper's store and calling the old man from his shuffling walk of weighing in the scales of the looking butter which an old negro had brought to exchange for a cast iron pig, thus addressed him:
"Old man, you've noticed me around here a good deal lately, haven't you?"
"Why, I don't know what I have, Jim," the old man answered, wiping his greasy hands on the bosom of his hickory shirt. The fact is, I have been so busy lately with this here rushin' line of commerce that I haven't had time to notice any thing."
"Not even Beulah?" Jim asked.
"Not even Beulah?" the old man demanded, somewhat gruffly. "What's Beulah got to do with anything that most concerns you?"
"Don't fly off the handle, as the boys said to the ax. I wanted to know if you had noticed me around here much lately, and you 'lowed that you had been too busy to notice any thing, but I'm sure you had noticed me around here much lately, and that's what the matter stands now."
"An' I want to know why you mention the girl?"
"Well, I just wanted to know if you have noticed the powerful strong affection that has been growin' up betwixt us ever since the protracted meetin' over at Station Camp Creek last fall."
"The old man sat down on a keg of nails and wore his greasy fingers together. "Jim, you don't mean to say that you are in love with Beulah, do you?"
"I not only mean to say it, Jas, but do say it right out."
"But do love, Jim?"
"How do you know?"
"Cause she 'loves she does."
"Well, that's the case, an' I don't mind sayin' it, I reckon she do, but I'm overawed by her, an' I don't want to marry nobody that amounted to something."
"Don't amount to nothin'?"
"Well, hardly, Jim. You're red headed, hungry lookin', knock-kneed, an' your front teeth air out."
"Yes, kicked out by a steer," Jim interposed.
"That don't make no difference. My daughter ain't called on to put up with the covin'ness of a steer, an' it don't make no difference how you lost your teeth. The girl is that you love, an' you love her."
"Now, Jas, I say, pluck his hand on the old man's shoulder, 'ef the fact that I ain't got no teeth is the biggest objection, w'y, I kin have some put in this fall 'ef the crop turns out right."
"Gras air mighty meatin', Jim, 'specially as it looks like we most have a drought this year, an' besides that, I want Beulah to marry a lawyer, or doctor, or something."
"Too late now, Jas, for we've done made up our minds to air gold' to marry whether y' consent or not."
"Well," the old man replied, getting up and again wiping his hands on the bosom of his hickory shirt, "I reckon you'll hatter take her, but you must rickolee one thing, Jimmy, an' that's this: you've got a jewel."
"I will, Jas."
"She's too good for any human bein', Jim."
"I know that, Jas."
"An' she's a plum jewel."
"I'm sure she is married. It was a great event in the neighborhood, and many a young pig squealed, and old Jasper spread a great feast. Just as the bride and groom were about to depart for their home, Jasper, after embracing his daughter, turned to Jim and said:
"Jim, don't you never fail to rickolee." "Rickolee what?" Beulah asked.
"That you air a jewel, my dear."
"Don't be foolish, poppa."
"I ain't foolish, honey, for if you ain't a plum jewel that never was one tuck onto the bottom of the sea. Good-bye, precious, an' don't forget to come over an' see me once in awhile, an' Jim, let me charge you airn't to forget."
Several days afterward Jim came into Jasper's store.
"Good mornin', Jimmy, good mornin'," exclaimed the old man, wiping his buttery hands on the bosom of his hickory shirt. "How is the jewel this mornin'?"
"Fast rate, Jas."
"Now, Jim, didn't I tell you the truth? Ain't she a jewel?"
"She is for a fact, Jas."
"A plum jewel, Jimmy?"
"A regular plum jewel, Jas."
"Glad you know it for y'own. Set down an' we'll eat a box or sardines."
He did not see Jim again until two weeks later. Then the son-in-law entered the store.
"Why, bless my soul, here is Jim!" exclaimed the old man. "Haven't seen her air n'ude of you for some time. How's the jewel?"
"She's all right. What's cheese sellin' at?"
"Best 15 cents a pound. Why hasn't the jewel been over to see me?"
"Don't know. Let me have about ha' pound."
The old man wanted to talk, but Jim, declaring that he was "holed for time," hastened away.
One evening, five days later, Jim entered the store again.
"Why, bless my soul, here is Jim!" exclaimed the old man. "Haven't seen her air n'ude of you for some time. How's the jewel?"

Mr. Bowser Papers a Room.

BY GUY R. READ.

Instead of going down after breakfast on the morning of Mr. Bowser slipped up stairs, and when he came down again he had on his old clothes. Some changes had been made in the house by the arrival of the rails of St. Paul's churchyard was apparent to all. Her chances of getting across the street safely did not seem to be good, and she shrank back into the shadows of the door.
"You are going to the office this morning?" I queried.
"Yes, I am not going to make parade?"
"Hardly. I propose to finish up that bed-room."
"Well, I shall paper the walls, to begin with."
"Mr. Bowser, I wish you wouldn't. I telephoned for a paper-hanger yesterday and he will be here to-morrow."
"And I shall be here to-morrow and I shall be here to-morrow. I propose to have that job done by the rails of St. Paul's churchyard was apparent to all. Her chances of getting across the street safely did not seem to be good, and she shrank back into the shadows of the door.

"Well, I shall paper the walls, to begin with."
"Mr. Bowser, I wish you wouldn't. I telephoned for a paper-hanger yesterday and he will be here to-morrow."
"And I shall be here to-morrow and I shall be here to-morrow. I propose to have that job done by the rails of St. Paul's churchyard was apparent to all. Her chances of getting across the street safely did not seem to be good, and she shrank back into the shadows of the door.
"You are going to the office this morning?" I queried.
"Yes, I am not going to make parade?"
"Hardly. I propose to finish up that bed-room."
