

about his apartments in evident satisfaction, when he had achieved any great purpose of the Church or State. The philosopher Newton would occasionally abandon his abstract studies, and go forth and employ himself by knocking at street doors, solely that he might enjoy the angry exclamations of the servants who answered his pranks summons. What was such pastime but a species of insanity? The apostle St. John, while on his mission at Patmos, was wont to engage himself in taming partridges—a pursuit apparently utterly incompatible with the dignity of the author of the glowing beauties of Apocalypse. Thus we find the extremes of littleness and greatness, proving the trite aphorism that "there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous."

The priest had not told the artist and his family that they would be guarded for the future against the misery and poverty which had overtaken them. He had devised his plans, and attached great importance in scrupulously concealing them from the world. Accordingly he experienced a very lively satisfaction in cunningly and mysteriously veiling from the artist and his family the projects he had in view for their future happiness and comfort.

We have seen the priest go in the direction of Versailles, after having delivered his sermon, but it is not our purpose to dog his steps thitherward; nor to scan his motives or purposes, whatever they were. The next morning, however, he appeared at the house of the painter, and tendered him the remainder of the money for the painting he had ordered on his previous visit. The subject for the painting was chosen, and the time fixed for its completion and delivery, when the priest bade the artist adieu, and departed on his way.

The liberality of the priest, in providing the means for the procurement of food and medicine for the painter, soon manifested its effects in the restoration of health and cheerfulness to himself and family. His face brightened up by day, until he began to be anxious to employ his pencil on the work designated by his benevolent friend. The countenance of his wife, too, resumed its natural sweetness and serenity of expression. A little gold had chased away poverty and despair, and brought comfort and happiness to the artist's home. Their child likewise, speedily passed, as it were, also, from the very pangs of starvation and death, to a lively, rousing boy, full of health and vigor—so quickly usually do children of tender years change from sickness to health, and from health to debility and emaciation of physical frame.

A fortnight had passed away when the good priest made his third visit to the abode of the artist. He found him so far improved in health as to have commenced the painting. The holy father was delighted, and now resolved to put in execution the little plan he had been maturing in his mind for the further benefit of the happy family.

"You are now sufficiently recovered, my son," said he to the artist, "to take a ride with me into the country. I wish you to accompany me to a friend of mine, residing at Versailles. He is an excellent man, and when we arrive there, I promise you not only pleasant company, but fine entertainment. I will come down in a carriage to-morrow, and we will go out together. What say you, my friend? Shall it be so?"

"Oh, that will be very charming," cried Angelique.

"We really thank you sincerely, good father. The air is now refreshing, and I think the ride will help to achieve the entire restoration of my health. Yes, we will all go, and many thanks to you, kind sir," said Antoine.

"Be it so, then. We will go before the heat of the day. Be ready at eight of the clock, in the morning, my children."

"Oh, yes, father, we will be sure to be ready at the hour appointed," replied Angelique.

The artist's family were all in readiness when the priest called in the morning with the carriage. They were soon off, and in a short time reached Versailles. They drove up to the door of a handsome villa near the castle and alighted. Presently they found themselves in the midst of a delightful garden filled with sweet flowers, rare shrubbery, and many graceful trees, while a stream of pellucid water meandered along and emptied itself into a large reservoir that occupied the middle of the grounds, where a jet d'eau scattered the glittering spray, like a shower of diamonds, on the rich green foliage around.

"Oh, what a delightful place this is!" rapturously exclaimed the artist's wife.

"Who is the owner, father, of these grounds and the elegant villa?" inquired Antoine.

"They belong to the king," replied the priest.

"And by whom are they occupied?"

"By the king's painter."

"And pray, what is his name?"

Something at that moment diverted the attention of the priest, so that he heard not the interrogation—at least he did not reply.

The party continued their stroll through the garden, and, after enjoying its beauties and the delicious fragrance of its world of birds and blossoms, finally entered the villa. Here they found the cloth was being laid for dinner, and, until the dishes were served, the visitors retired to an ante-room and rested awhile from their walk in the garden. This room was fitted up in a style of rare good taste, and furnished with corresponding elegance and propriety.

A young femme de chambre now presented herself to Angelique and inquired—

"In what manner can I serve you, my lady?"

"My lady!" ejaculated the artist and his wife, in the least, taken by surprise and thrown off their guard. Suspecting nothing, they looked around for the mistress of the habitation. The old father seemed to enjoy their confusion amazingly, and laughed outright, though he had the tact to retire to the window and pretend to be amused at something without.

The artist and his wife now began to realize that there was something new in store for them, and glanced their eyes inquiringly upon the priest. They knew not what to expect. Their measure of happiness was already complete, and the events of the past few weeks had been as the illusions of a bewildering dream. Their suspense was soon relieved by the worthy clergyman. He produced from under his cassock a roll of parchment, with the royal seal attached, and remarked—

"If you are unacquainted with the occupant of this cottage, you may discover from this commission the name of the king's painter. Here, my dear sir, you may read it for yourself."

"Antoine de Laonaise," exclaimed the astonished Angelique.

"I" repeated the artist "oh, father, this is really beyond all comprehension. What have I done to merit so much kindness and attention? You have indeed been a friend and benefactor to us," continued Antoine, warmly pressing the hand of the good old man, while tears of heartfelt gratitude trickled down his manly face. His wife, too, could only sob aloud and fall on her knees at the feet of the priest.

"Enough! my children," said the father. "You owe me nothing whatever. I have been only the instrument in the hands of the Most High to put an end to your sufferings and sorrows. Praise and acknowledgments are due to God alone for his mercies and blessings, my children." The priest's utterance was choked, and he, too, brushed away a tear. He then added: "Your talents, my son, have been known for some time past to the Court, and this commission is only due to your genius and taste. Justice has been extended—that is all. Be assured, my children, I should have demanded nothing unjust, even were it to insure the happiness of my dearest friend: as so you are esteemed by me."

"Oh, father, you have saved us from the direct extremity, and we shall never cease to be grateful to you for the happiness we now experience."

"Say no more. The dinner is ready. We will partake of the repast, when I must go my way."

The dinner was discussed in a hearty and merry manner, the artist earnestly drinking the health of his aged patron, and wishing him prolonged days and every enjoyment of life.

When the feast was over the priest took up his staff to depart.

"You must visit us often, father, will you not?" said Angelique, holding forth her beautiful child for his blessing.

"No, my daughter. I depart on a mission to Flanders to-morrow, and may never return hitherward again. We old missionaries seldom tarry long at one place. We must ever journey on our apostolic pilgrimage till the hour of our dissolution shall come."

"And what is the reward of such missions of faith and peace?" inquired the artist.

The priest raised his eyes to heaven, in fervent reverence, and then took a final leave of his friends.

Yes, the reward of such men is—HEAVEN!

Yes, the reward of such men is—HEAVEN!
