

ROVER'S WISDOM.

How He Cooled His Dinner After a Great Deal of Thinking.

Rover's dinner was very hot. When Jane cooked it for him she poured it into his pan, and set it out on the grass to cool.

Rover had often thought it strange that his dinner should always be hot when it was poured into his pan. It did not stay hot. It got cool when it had been in the pan a bit, but it was always hot at first.

He looked at the smoke coming out of the pan, and watched it blow away over the house. Then he lay down and barked at his dinner.

There was snow all over the grass. When Jane set out the pan, she put it upon the snow, so that it would cool faster.

When Rover had looked at his dinner, and at the smoke, and at the snow awhile, and thought how strange some things are, he got up and stood beside the pan.

First he tried to pull the scraps of meat out of the snow, but they hurt his mouth, and he barked again. Then he stooped, and, with his nose, pushed the snow over the edges of the pan until he had covered his dinner with snow, and cooled it so that he could eat it.

So his thoughts by the fire had done him some good. Was he not a wise dog?—Harper's Young People.

SLOW COACHES BEST.

Why Aunt Hannah Prefers Walking to a Railroad Excursion.

The great, roaring, hissing, steaming trains of engine and cars which pant and slip over the iron roads that net all lands, are still to the negroes who dwell deep in the black belt a source of constant wonderment.

But to the town-bred darky an excursion on the cars is a magnificent delight. Oftentimes some country negro or some old uncle or aunty who has not gotten out of old before-the-war ways is overpersuaded by curiosity to take passage for a short round trip on the train.

"I say: My soul! Ef I git out this thing and I never git on agin. I say: what's de voice dat can say 'Wo' or 'Gee' loud enough fer ter make dis roarin' eriter hear de words and turn ter de right or de left. Other folks wuz laughin' an' talkin', Hannah wuz prayin', Hannah can't laugh when she is in de arms er commotion, bein' swif' toted ter destruction! Hannah can't talk foolishness when she's in terrible danger drivin' towards de jaws of death."

Another negress—one who was prudent enough to have resisted the temptation to take her life in her hands by trusting herself to the steel-clasped steed of steam—congratulated herself on her constant prudence:

"No, sir! No, sir! I don't make use of no trains er cars, I don't. I is no ways given to ridin' high off de groun'! Time enough ter rise 'bove de good groun' when dese heah feet 'gin ter slip an' slide on de golden street. When I am on dese feet on dis heah groun', I know what's de pace an' motion I got ter count on, but when I mounts high I don't know how I am gwine move out, and dat's de reason I don't mount no cars, neither no carriage, an' mo'n dat neither horse nor yit goat. Give me walkin' an' no ridin'! Give me steppin' an' no slidin'!"—Martha Young, in Wide Awake.

An Elephant's Ideas.

Most of an elephant's skin is very callous, but some parts are exceedingly tender, and he is sensitive to the stings and bites of flies and other insects, which often cause him torture. Although he is so huge and powerful, he is not well adapted to fighting such enemies. His tail is too short to reach them, and his trunk not long enough to defend himself from the little pests. In his native forests he is said to snap branches off the trees, and with his trunk use them for brushes to drive off his tormentors. Sometimes he fans the air with this weapon to prevent the insects settling. A driver will use the branch of a tree to keep flies from his horse; but it is queer indeed to think that an elephant should have such a bright idea.—Harper's Young People.

It Would Be Large.

Six-year-old James, of Boston, and his New York cousin were disputing about the relative size of their respective cities, says the Boston Transcript.

Quotations from the census returns rather staggered the youthful flubbert at first, but he soon brushed them aside with the remark:

"Well, I'll bet yer Boston's de biggest, if yer take in all de hubbubs."
