BUSY SCENES AT THE PORTS OF LAKE ERIE.

Millions of Tons of Michigan Iron Ore Find Their Way to Cleveland, Ashtabula and Erie—Interesting Information About a Gigantic Industry.

CLEVELAND, Sept. 29.—When the great transportation hall of the Columbian exposition next year is filled with representations of systems and methods of moving the world's products it will have few that will surpass in unique and peculiar interest the sight that may be seen daily at the ore ports of Lake Erie.

The discovery of extremely rich and almost inexhaustible deposits of Bessemer ore in the Lake Superior districts a quarter of a century ago, as well as more recently, has been followed by the growth of a commerce that is unrivaled of its kind in the world, and nowhere to

The coal docks are over two miles in length, but narrow, and the coal is usually loaded directly from the cars by means of derricks that handle great buckets holding half a ton or more.

Both ore and coal docks gather an added interest when one thinks of their varied and close relations to the comfort and industry of the central west and great northwest, and what appears at first as only strange and unusual becomes richly suggestive of the great age of steel in which we live.

When, in addition to what goes from Cleveland, the large shipments from Toledo, Sandusky, Ashtabula, Erie and Buffalo are considered the aggregate reaches an amount as amazing as that of the ore traffic.

It is almost impossible to appreciate the magnitude of this great traffic without a walk along the docks between great ranges of iron ore hills twenty, thirty and forty feet in height, only a few railroad tracks separating them like narrow valleys, and overhead a great steel framework of ore hoisting machines.

Half hidden behind the ranges of red, brown or sparkling gray ore, the colors varying with the qualities, is the pony engine operating each set of hoisting machines, puffing and hissing away adding a familiar element to the strange scene.

The old Barlow homestead was demolished in 1823, and local antiquaries can merely locate its site in the western part of the town.

At present the activity on the ore docks, whether at Cleveland, Fairport or Ashtabula, is almost at its height.

A short distance from the old building is the site of the first Methodist camp ground in New England, established about 1810.

is heaped bills of fine red and brown hematite, like so much ochreous gravel, or the coarser lumps of sparkling gray magnetic ore, varying widely in quality and price.

The casual observer as he walks along can distinguish but four or five, or at most half a dozen, grades of ore, but experts know that these immense conical piles are strictly classified, and that upward of eighty different grades have their place in the market lists.

Besides this great ore traffic, which annually amounts to $30,000,000 or more in value, there is shipped from the ports of Lake Erie an immense amount of coal, both anthracite and bituminous, to Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth and smaller points, where it is stored for shipment farther west during the winter months.

Without this the Cleveland docks can handle 1,000 ordinary carloads of coal a day, and the total shipments from the port each year reaches 70,000 carloads, or enough to make a train over 450 miles long!
