Evening Chat

THE BANKER
 Out in the cornfield where I worked
 When I was a boy, a little boy,
 The subtle dreams of the city lurked,
 And the hush of the corn and monotonous
 Of the cricket's song was hard on me,
 And I longed for a job in the path of trade
 Where I'd ne'er again see a hoe-or spade,
 Where I'd go to work when the sun
 was high,
 And quit with it's rays still in the sky.
 One day the dream of my life came true
 And my work and toll on the farm
 was through,
 And I came to town with a suburn
 hide,
 And assurance, ambition and hope
 inside,
 And I went to school in the school-
 house here,
 Where I learned to cuss and consume beer,
 And I learned to mean a different
 way,
 Than the things that I was wont to
 say,
 And, for occasion, I learned to lie
 And keep a steady, sincere eye—
 And when I was full of this knowledge
 rare,
 With a red necktie and slicked up
 hair,
 Of the cup of wisdom, full I drank,
 Then they gave me a job in a city
 bank,
 Where they work all day and half
 the night,
 And lay and worry 'til morning light,
 Where they figure and figure all the
 day,
 'Till their pates get bald and their
 temples grey—
 . . . . .
 How I look back to that field of corn,
 And the welcome sound of the dinner
 horn,
 And the song of the cricket and summer air,
 And the sweet, white cot in the chamber there,
 And I long for the health and peace
 and joy,
 When I was a boy, a little boy.
 —THE DEACON.

Curiously enough yesterday, which was marked by an air raid on London in which fifty or more people were killed, the mails brought the London papers containing the accounts of the previous air raid which occurred on Saturday, May 26, but did not reach London. In this previous raid 76 people were killed outright and 174 were injured. The London Times gave the news on its seventh page of the issue of the following Monday, May 28. It is only fair to say that this was the editorial page and was printed right opposite the main news page of the paper. Following is every word that was printed in The Daily Chronicle about the occurrence, an occurrence, by the way, that would have caused a fit in American newspaper offices. It throws an interesting light upon our journalism at the news center of the world during war time.

HEAVY LOSS OF LIFE IN AIR RAID.

76 KILLED IN SOUTH OF ENGLAND TOWN.

3 OF 16 ENEMY MACHINES BROUGHT DOWN.

Never before have so many people been killed and injured in an aerial attack on this country as in that which took place on Friday evening on South-eastern England. The casualties, as reported by Lord French, Commanding-in-Chief Home Forces, were as follows:

KILLED.		INJURED.
Women	27	Women	43
Children	23	Children	19
Men	26	Men	112
Total	76	Total	174

There were 16 German aircraft in the attacking squadron, and they passed over the district between 5:15 and 6:30. Nearly all the damage occurred in one town.

Three of the raiding aeroplanes were brought down by Royal Naval Air Service machines over the North Sea on their way back. One British airman attacked three of the Germans and destroyed one. All our machines returned safely.

The previous most disastrous raid on this country was on January 31, 1916, when 67 people were killed and 117 injured in a Zeppelin attack on Eastern and Midland counties.

HAVOC AMONG SHOPPERS.

TERRIBLE SCENES IN CROWDED ESTABLISHMENTS.

From Our Special Correspondent.
 A SOUTH COAST TOWN, Saturday. Sixty-three people, chiefly women and children, are dead, and 83 are injured as a result of last night's raid.

There is a short, rather narrow street here, which is the shopping Mecca of all the poorer classes in the town. At one moment it was crowded with a gay throng of busy shoppers, chiefly women and children; the next it was a shambles. Shops which had been packed with customers had collapsed like houses of cards, burying all within under the wreckage. Out in the street women and children were dotting the roadway and paths, some dead, some dying, some screaming horribly in the agony of terrible injuries. Of the total deaths which have taken place in this part of the raided area no fewer than 50 were the result of the two bombs which dropped in this street. Quite 30 people were killed outright while others died on the way to the hospitals or soon after arriving there. In the total there are 26 women and 23 children.

The sun was shining brilliantly, with not a cloud to be seen, when the attention of the people in the streets was attracted by a loud hum from the west-ern sky.

But so high were the raiders flying—authoritative estimates put the altitude at 15,000 ft.—that it was quite an appreciable interval before the watchers discerned far inland the approach of a small, dove-shaped machine, which was obviously acting as a scout. Behind it came the first line of the raiders' formation, five of them flying in perfect order.

STARTING RIGHT

the bright sunlight, and even as the startled crowds realized their mission from the sound of distant reports another row of five swept into sight, swerving more to the left, so as to keep to the north of the railway line. The most venturesome had time to note the arrival of still a third line of esmy planes, with another solitary one bringing up the rear.

"At a spot not far from where I stood," one man told me, "quite a dozen bombs must have fallen within an area of 200 square yards. But nearly all fell either in the roadways or in the gardens; and though every pane of glass for a long distance round was shattered, the damage done was extraordinarily small, and the only casualties of which I heard were an old woman who had her foot slightly injured, and a man who also sustained a slight cut.

"But the sight was appalling in one shopping street where most damage had been caused. For about 200 yards the street looked a shambles. Women and children were lying about dead and dying, and there were screams for help from one spot where a large butcher's establishment had utterly collapsed, burying staff and customers in the ruins.

"Two bombs had fallen in the centre of the roadway here, and the explosion had swept the whole area. Opposite the butcher's was a large draper's shop which had been crowded with customers, and here the mortality was frightful. I saw one poor woman huddled up against the counter with her head completely severed.

"CUSTOMERS BURIED IN RUINS.
 The butcher's shop was built principally of wood. The result of the explosion was to cut it away almost in its entirety from the adjacent buildings, and to leave it a mess of smoking ruins, with hardly on fragment on another. One of the heads of the firm was himself among the victims, and I am told that six of the assistants were buried with him in the ruins. With them were many customers and others who had sought shelter there.

"At the draper's shop opposite the whole front had been blown in, and the crowded finery in the windows reduced to a mass of tattered and begrimed rags. One eye-witness told me that the customers crowded in between the counters were simply mown down by the force of the explosion.

"It was a terrible sight," an assistant told me. "Bombs seemed to be exploding all over the neighborhood. We heard them getting louder and louder, as the aeroplanes came nearer and nearer to us, and then there was an awful crash as the two bombs exploded in the street. The whole front of the shop seemed to be blown in, and I was flung right off my feet on to the floor.

"One of the assistants had a marvelous escape. She was in the store room on the floor above when the explosion occurred, and the big skylight just where she was standing was shattered to bits. She was hurled right down into the shop, a distance of nearly 20 ft., but escaped absolutely unscathed."

AERIAL TORPEDO IN A HOTEL.

Not far away, in a street in the center of the town, three bombs fell and exploded in the roadway within a distance of 20 yards. The first two exploded practically opposite a large elementary school and the girls' county school. Fortunately at that time of the evening the premises were unoccupied in each case, but if the raid had occurred an hour or so earlier, when the scholars were there, the death-roll must have been frightful, for both buildings were seriously damaged, and in one case the class rooms face the road.

A little four year old girl, the daughter of the proprietor of a large theatre, also had a remarkable escape. Here an aerial torpedo fell in one of the tennis courts. It dug its way without exploding many feet into the soft earth, doing no damage beyond hurling big pieces of turf widespread. The little girl, who was playing less than six yards away was unharmed.

A portion of the torpedo was found half buried in the turf a few yards away. Its size and that of the hole where the torpedo disappeared show the proportions of the great missile. If it had exploded the child must have been blown to pieces. The torpedo bore the number "26" written on several times with a blue pencil.

Another aerial torpedo fell on a large hotel in the western end of the town. It penetrated the roof and three floors before it exploded, and the tremendous power of the explosive used is shown by the fact that one large fragment which was flung through the wall and across an adjoining side street, bored its way through the walls of three successive shops before it came to a standstill.

Marvellously enough no one was injured in this terrific explosion.

TOWN COUNCIL AND ALIENS.
 Quite a number of bombs which actually struck buildings failed to explode, while others buried themselves harmlessly in the golf links and other open spaces.

A hotel bus driver was killed, together with his two horses, by a bomb which fell in the roadway, and another man passing at the time was also injured so terribly that he died almost immediately.

A special meeting of the town council was held this afternoon, when a resolution of sympathy with the dead and injured was passed. A discussion arose on the question of internment of enemy aliens, and one councillor expressed the view that if this were not done there would certainly be trouble.

A resolution was eventually carried that a deputation should be sent to the Home Secretary with a view to securing some more efficient method of

DEALING WITH THE ENEMY ALIEN ELEMENT.

Several members raised the question of our anti-aircraft defenses. After a heated discussion it was resolved to send a deputation to the authorities on this point.

The inquest on the victims was adjourned till Tuesday evening. The mayor has opened a relief fund for the sufferers by the raid. It has also been decided to give the victims a public funeral.

GERMAN REPORT.

BERLIN, Saturday.
 During the course of a successful raid one of our air squadrons dropped bombs on Dover and Folkestone, on the south coast of England.—Admiralty, per Wireless Press.

MAN KILLED; WIFE SHOT.

UNIONTOWN, Pa., June 14.—Victor Bossel, aged 32, was shot and killed while asleep in his wife's apartment in Buffington, near here, this morning, and his wife, Mrs. Frances Bossel, aged 34, was wounded probably fatally in the abdomen. The police alleged that Mrs. Bossel, who is in the Uniontown hospital, said that she shot herself after firing a bullet into her husband's temple.
