The Return of SHERLOCK HOLMES

By A. CONAN DOYLE,

Author of "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes,"
"The Hound of the Baskervilles," "The Sign of the Four." "A Study in Scarlet," Etc.

ILLUSTRATED BY F. D. STEELE

The Adventure of the Golden Pince-Nez

No. 10 of the Series

(Coppeigns, 1904, by A. Cunan Dayle and Collier's (Copperight, 1905, by McClure, Phillips & Co.)

HEN I look at the thre massive manuscript volumes which contain our work for the year 1894 I confess that it is very difficult for me out of such a wealth of mate rial to relect the cases which are most interesting in themselves and at the name time most conducive to a display of those peculiar powers for which my friend was famous. As I turn over th bages I see my notes upon the repulsive story of the red leech and the terribi death of Crosby, the banker. Here a so I find an account of the Addleton tragedy and the singular contents of the ancient British barrow. The fa mous Smith-Mortimer succession case comes also within this period, and se do the tracking and arrest of Huret. the bonievard assassin, an exploi which won for Holmes an autograp! letter of thanks from the French pres dent and the order of the Legion of Honor. Euch of these would furnish a parrative, but on the whole I am of that none of them unites s many singular points of interest as the episode of Yoxley Old Place, which in cludes not only the lamentable death of young Willoughby Smith, but also those subsequent developments which threw so curious a light upon the cause of the crime.

It was a wild, tempestuous might, to ward the close of November. Holmes and I sat together in silence all the evening, he engaged with a powerful lens deciphering the remains of the original inscription upon a palimpsest I deep in a recent treatise upon surgery. Outside the wind howled down Baker street, while the rain beat flerce ly against the windows. It was strange there, in the very depths of the town, with ten miles of man's bandi work on every side of us, to feel the fron grip of Nature and to be conscious that to the huge elemental forces all

London was no more than the molehills that dot the fields. I walked to the window and looked out on the deserted street. The occasional lamps gleamed on the expanse of muddy road and shin ing pavement. A single cab was splashing its way from the Oxford street end

"Well, Watson, it's as well we have not to turn out touight" said Holmes laying aside his lens and rolling up the palimpsest. "I've done enough for one pitting. It is trying work for the eyes Bo far as I can make out it is nothing more exciting than an abbe's account dating from the second half of the fifteenth century. Hello, hello, hello What's this?"

Amid the droning of the wind there had come the stamping of a horse's hoofs and the long grind of a wheel as it rasped against the curb. The cab which I had seen had pulled up at our

"What can be want?" I ejaculated as a man stepped out of it.

'Want? He wants us. And we, my poor Watson, want overcoats and crarats and galoches and every nid that man ever invented to fight the weather. Wait a bit though! There's the cab off There's hope yet. He'd have kept it if he had wanted us to come. Run down, my dear fellow, and open the door, for all virtuous folk have been

When the light of the ball lamp fel upon our midnight visitor I had no dif-Sculty in recognizing him. It was young Stanley Hopkins, a promising detective, in whose career Holmes had several times shown a very practical

"Is he in?" he asked engerly. "Come up, my dear sir," said Holmes" voice from above. "I hope you have no Besigns upon us such a night as this."

The detective mounted the stairs, and our lamp gleamed upon his shining waterproof. I helped him out of it, while Holmes knocked a blaze out of the logs

"Now, my dear Hopkins, draw up and warm your toes," said he. "Here's a cigar, and the doctor has a prescrip tion containing hot water and a lemon which is good medicine on a night like this. It must be something important which has brought you out in such a

"It is indeed, Mr. Holmes. I've had a bustling afternoon, I promise you. Did you see anything of the Yoxley case in the latest editions?" "I've seen nothing later than the fif teenth century today.'

"Well, it was only a paragraph and all wrong at that, so you have not miss ed anything. I haven't let the grass grow under my feet. It's down in Kent, seven miles from Chatham and three from the restway line. I was wired for at 8:15, reached Yoxley Old Place at 5, conducted my investigation, was back at Charing Cross by the last train, and straight to you by cab."

"Which means, I suppose, that you are not quite clear about your case?" "It means that I can make neither head nor tail of it. So far as I can see it is just as tangled aphusiness as ever I handled, and yet at Arst it seemed so simple that one confidn't go wrong. There's no motive, Mr. Holmes. That's what bothers me. I can't put my hand on a motive. "Here's a man deadthere's no denying that-but, so far as can see, no reason on earth why any

"Let us hear about it," said he. "I've got my facts pretty clear," said

Stanley Hopkins. "All I want now is to know what they all mean. The story, so far as I can make it out, is like this: Some years ago this country house, Yoxley Old Place, was taken by an elderly man, who gave the name of Professor Coram. He was an invalid, keeping his bed half the time and the other half hobbling round the house with a stick or being pushed about the grounds by the gardener in a bath chair. He was well liked by the few neighbors who called upon him, and he has the reputation down there of being a very learned man Ills household used to consist of an elderly housekeeper, Mrs. Marker, and of a maid, Susan Tariton. These have both been with him since his arrival and they seem to be women of excel lent character. The professor is writing a learned book, and he found it necessary about a year ago to engage a secretary. The first two that he tried were not successes, but the third, Mr. Willoughby Smith, a very young man straight from the university, seems to have been just what his employer wanted. His work consisted in writing all the morning to the professor's dictation, and he usually spent the evening in hunting up references and passages which bore upon the next day's work. This Willoughby Smith has nothing against him, either as a boy at Uppingham or as a young man at Cambridge. I have seen his testimonials, and from the first he was a decent, quiet, hardworking fellow, with no weak spot in him at all. And yet this is the lad who has met his death this morning in the professor's study under circumstances which can point

The wind howled and screamed at the windows. Holmes and I drew closer to the fire, while the young inspector slowly and point by point developed his singular narrative.

only to murder."

"If you were to search all England." said he, "I don't suppose you could find a household more self contained or freer from outside influences. Whole weeks would pass and not one of them go past the garden gate. The professor was buried in his work and existed for nothing else. Young Smith knew nobody in the neighborhood and lived very much as his employer did. The two women had nothing to take them from the bouse. Mortimer, the gardener, who wheels the bath chair, is an army pensioner, an old Crimean man of excellent character. He does not live in the house but in a three roomed cottage at the other end of the garden. Those are the only peo ple that you would find within the grounds of Yoxley Old Place. At the same time the gate of the garden is a hundred yards from the main London to Chatham road. It opens with a latch, and there is nothing to preent any one from walking in.

"Now I will give you the evidence of Susan Tariton, who is the only per son who can say anything positive about the matter. It was in the forenoon, between 11 and 12. She was engaged at the moment in hanging some curtains in the upstairs front bed room. Professor Coram was still in bed, for when the weather is bad he seldom rises before middny. The house keeper was busied with some work it the back of the house. Willoughby Smith had been in his bedroom, which be uses as a sitting room, but the maid heard him at that moment pass along the passage and descend to the study immediately below her. She did not see him, but she says that she could not be mistaken in his quick, firm tread. She did not hear the study door close, but a minute or so later there was a dreadful cry in the room below. It was a wild, hourse scream, so strange and unnatural that it might have come either from a man or a woman. At the same instant there was a heavy thud which shook the old bouse, and then all was silence The maid stood petrified for a moment and then, recovering her courage, she ran downstairs. The study door was shut, and she opened it. Inside young Mr. Willoughby Smith was stretched upon the floor. At first she could see no injury, but as she tried to raise him she saw that blood was pouring from the underside of his neck. It was plerced by a very small but very deep wound, which had divided the carotid artery. The instrument with which the injury had been inflicted lay upon the carpet beside him. It was one of those small sealing wax knives to be found on old fashioned writing tables, with an ivory handle and a stiff blade. It was part of the fittings of the professor's own desk.

"At first the maid thought that your Smith was already dead, but on pouring some water from the carafe over his forehend he opened his eyes for an instant. "The professor,' he murmured-'it was she.' The maid is prepared to swear that those were the exact words. He tried desperately to say comething else, and he held his right hand up in the air. Then he fell back "In the meantime the housekeep had also arrived upon the scene, but she was just too late to catch the young man's dying words. Leaving Susan with the body, she hurried to the professor's room. He was sitting up in bed horribly agitated, for he had heard enough to convince him that something terseite had occurred. Mrs. Marker is ered to swear that the professor was still in his night clothes, and, in-deed, it was impossible for him to dress without the help of Mortimer, whose orders were to come at 12 cleck. The professor declares that he neard the distant cry, but that he imagines that they were the eutcome of delirium. He believes that Wilsouth world, and can give no reason for the crime. His first action was to send Mortimer, the gardener, for the local police. A little later the chief constable sent for me. Nothing was moved before I got there, and strict orders were given that no one should walk upon the paths leading to the bouse. It was a splendid chance of putting your theories into practice, Mr. Sherlock Holmes. There was really nothing "Except Mr. Sherlock Holmes." said my companion, with a somewhat bitter "Well, let us hear about it. What sort of a job did you make of

"I must ask you first, Mr. Holmes, to giance at this rough plan, which will give you a general idea of the position of the professor's study and the various points of the case. It will belp you in following my investigation."

He unfolded the rough chart, which I here reproduce, and he laid it across Holmes' knee. I rose and, standing be hind Holmes, studied it over his shoul-

"It is very rough, of course, and it only deals with the points which seem to me to be essential. All the rest you will see later for yourself. Now, first of all, presuming that the assassin entered the house, how did he or she come in? Undoubtedly by the garden path and the back door, from which there is direct access to the study. Any other way would have been exceedingly complicated. The escape must have also been made along that line, for of the two other exits from the room one was blocked by Susan as she ran downstairs and the other leads straight to the professor's bedroom. I therefore directed my attention at once to the garden path, which was saturated with recent rain and would certainly show any footmarks

"My examination showed me that I was dealing with a cautious and expert criminal. No footmarks were to be found on the path. There could be no question, however, that some one had passed along the grass border which lines the path and that he had done so in order to avoid leaving a track. I could not find anything in the nature of a distinct impression, but the grass was trodden down and some one had undoubtedly passed. It could only have been the murderer, since neither the gardener nor any one else had been there that morning and the rain had only begun during the night."

Hopkins' plan of Yoxley Old Place.

"One moment," said Holmes, "Where does this path lead to?"

"To the road." "How long is it?"

"A hundred yards or so." "At the point where the path passes through the gate you could surely pick up the tracks?"

"Unfortunately the path was tiled at that point." "Well, on the road itself?" "No, it was all trodden into mire."

"Tut tut! Well, then, these tracks upon the grass, were they coming or

"It was impossible to say. There was never any outline." "A large foot or a small?"

"You could not distinguish." Holmes gave an ejaculation of im

"It has been pouring rain and blowing a burricane ever since," said he "It will be harder to read now that that palimpsest. Well, well, it can't be helped. What did you do, Hop kins, after you had made certain that you had made certain of nothing?" "I think I made certain of a good deal, Mr. Holmes, I knew that some one had entered the house cautiously from without. I next examined the corridor. It is lined with cocoanut matting and had taken no impression of any kind. This brought me into the study itself. It is a scantily furnished room. The main article is a large writing table with a fixed bureau. This bureau consists of a double column of drawers, with a central small cupboard between them. The drawers were open, the cupboard locked. The drawers, it seems, were always open, and nothing of value was kept in them. There were some papers of importance in the cupboard but there were no signs that this had been tampered with, and the professor assures me that nothing was missing It is certain that no robbery has been committed. "I come now to the body of the youn man. It was found near the bureau and just to the left of it, as marked upon that chart. The stab was on the right side of the neck and from behind forward, so that it is almost impossi ble that it could have been self in-

"Unless he fell upon the knife," said Holmes.

"Exactly. The idea crossed my mind. But we found the kuife some feet away from the body, so that seems impossible. Then, of course there are the man's own dying words And, finally, there was this very important piece of evidence which was found clasped in the dead man's right

From his pocket Stanley Hopkins drew a small paper packet. He un-folded it and disclosed a golden pincenez, with two broken ends of black silk cord dangling from the end of it "Willoughby Smith had excellent sight," he added. "There can be no question that this was snatched from the face or the person of the assassin." Sheriock Holmes took the glasses into his hand and examined them with the utmost attention and interest. He held them on his nose, endeavored to read through them, went to the win low and stared up the street with them, looked at them most minutely in the full light of the lamp and finally, with a chuckle, seated himself at th table and wrote a few lines upon sheet of paper, which he tossed acro to Stanley Hopkins.

"That's the best I can do for you." said he. "It may prove to be of some

The astonished detective read the note aloud. It ran as follows:

Wanted, a woman of good address, at-tired like a lady. She has a remarkably upon either side of it. She has a puckered forehead, a peering expression and probably reunded shoulders. There are indications that she has had recourse to an optician at least twice during the last few months. As her glasses are of remarkable strength and as opticians are not very numerous, there should be no difficulty in tracing her.

Holmes smiled at the astonishment of Hopkins, which must have been reflected upon my features.

"Surely my deductions are simplicity itself," said he. "It would be difficult to name any articles which afford s finer field for interence than a pair of glasses, especially so remarkable a pair as these. That they belong to a woman I infer from their delicacy and also of course from the last words of the dying man. As to her being a person of refinement and well dressed, they are, as you perceive, handsomely mounted in solid gold, and it is inconceivable that any one who wore such glasses could be slatternly in other respects. You will find that the clips are too wide for your nose, showing that the lady's nose was very broad at the base. This sort of nose is usually a short and coarse one, but there is a sufficient number of exceptions to prevent me from being dogmatic or from insisting upon this point in my description. My own face is a narrow one, and yet I find that I cannot get my eyes into the center nor near the center of these glasses, Therefore the lady's eyes are set very near to the sides of the nose. You will perceive, Watson, that the glasses are concave and of unusual strength. A lady whose vision has been so extreme ly contracted all her life is sure to have the physical characteristics of such vision, which are seen in the forehead. the eyelids and the shoulders."

"Yes," I said, "I can follow each of your arguments. I confess, however, that I am unable to understand how you arrive at the double visit to the optician."

Holmes took the glasses in his hand, "You will perceive," he said, "that the clips are lined with tiny bands of cork to soften the pressure upon the nose. One of these is discolored and worn to some slight extent, but the off and been replaced. I should judge that the older of them has not been there more than a few months. They exactly correspond, so I gather that the lady went back to the same establishment for the second."

"By George, it's marvelous!" cried Hopkins, in an ecstasy of admiration. "To think that I had all that evidence intended, however, to go the round of the London opticians."

"Of course you would. Meanwhile, have you anything more to tell us about the case?

"Nothing, Mr. Holmes, I think that you know as much as I do now-probably more. We have had inquiries made as to any stranger seen on the country roads or at the railway station. We have heard of none. What beats me is the after want of all object in the crime. Not a ghost of a motive can any one suggest." "Ah, there I am not in a position to belp you! But I suppose you want us to come out tomorrow?"

"If it is not asking too much, Mr. Holmes. There's a train from Charing Cross to Chatham at 6 in the morning. and we should be at Yoxley Old Place

"Then we shall take it. Your case has certainly some features of great interest, and I shall be delighted to look into it. Well, it's nearly 1, and we had best get a few hours' sleep. I dare say you can manage all right on the sofa in front of the fire. I'll light my spirit lamp and give you a cup of coffee before we start."

The gale had blown itself out next day, but it was a bitter morning when we started upon our journey. We saw the cold winter sun rise over the dreary marshes of the Thames and the long. sullen reaches of the river, which I shall ever associate with our pursuit of the Andaman islander in the earlier days of our career. After a long and weary journey we alighted at a small station some miles from Chatham. While a horse was being put into a trap at the local inn we snatched a hurried breakfast, and so we were all ready for business when we at last arrived at Yoxley Old Place. A constable met us at the garden gate.

"Well, Wilson, any news?"

"No, sir-nothing."

"No reports of any stranger seen?" "No, sir. Down at the station they are certain that no stranger either came or went yesterday."

"Have you had inquiries made at inns and lodgings?" "Yes, sir. There is no one that w

"Well, it's only a reasonable walk to Chatham. Any one might stay there or take a train without being observed. This is the garden path of which I spoke, Mr. Holmes. I'll pledge my word there was no mark on it yesterday." "On which side were the marks or "This side, sir-this narrow margin of grass between the path and the flower bed. I can't see the traces now, but they were clear to me then."

"Yes, yes; some one has passed along," said Holmes, stooping over the grass border. "Our lady must have picked her steps carefully, must she not, since on the one side she would leave a track on the path and on the other an even clearer one on the soft "Yes, sir; she must have been a cool

I saw an intent look pass over

"You say that she must have come back this way?"

"Yes, sir; there is no other." "On this strip of grass?" "Certainly, Mr. Holmes."

"Hum! It was a very remarkable erformance—very remarkable. Well, think we have exhausted the path. Let us go farther. This garden door is usually kept open, I suppose. Then walk in. The idea of murder was not in her mind or she would have provided herself with some sort of wespon instead of having to pick this knife of the writing table. She advanced along this corridor, leaving no traces upor the cocoanut matting. Then she found she there? We have no means of judg-

"Not more than a few minutes, sir, I forgot to tell you that Mrs. Marker the housekeeper, had been in there tidy ing not very long before-about a quar ter of an hour, she says." "Well, that gives us a limit. Our la dy enters this room, and what does she do? She goes over to the writing table. What for? Not for anything in the drawers. If there had been anything worth her taking it would surely have been locked up. No, it was for something in that wooden bureau. Hello! What is that scratch upon the face of it? Just hold a match, Watson. Why did you not tell me of this, Hopkins?"

The mark which he was examining began upon the brasswork on the right hand side of the keyhole and extended for about four inches, where it had scratched the varnish from the surface "I noticed it, Mr. Holmes, but you'll always find scratches round a key-

"This is recent, quire recent, See how the brass shines where it is cut. An old scratch would be the same color as the surface. Look at it through my There's the varnish, too, like lens. earth on each side of a furrow. Is Mrs. Marker there?" A sad faced elderly woman came in-

"Did you dust this bureau yesterday morning?"

"Did you notice this scratch?"

"No. sir: I did not." "I am sure you did not, for a duster would have swept away these shreds of varnish. Who has the key of this bureau?"

"The professor keeps it on his watch chain.

"Is it a simple key?" "No. sir; it is a Chubb's key."

"Very good, Mrs. Marker, you can go Now we are making a little progress. Our lady enters the room, advances to the bureau and either mens it or tries to do so. While she is thus engaged young Willoughby Smith enters the room. In her hurry to with draw the key she makes this scratch upon the door. He seizes her, and she, snatching up the nearest object, which happens to be this knife, strikes at him in order to make him let go his hold. other is new. Evidently one has fallen The blow is a fatal one. He falls, and she escapes, either with or without the object for which she has come. Is Susan, the maid, there? Could any one have got away through that door after the time that you heard the cry, Su-

"No, sir; it is impossible. Before got down the stair I'd have seen any one in the passage. Besides, the door in my hand and never knew it! I had pever opened or I would have heard "That settles this exit. Then no doubt the lady went out the way she came. I understand that this other passage leads only to the professor's room. There is no exit that way?"

"No. sir." "We shall go down it and make the acquaintance of the professor. Hello, Hopkins, this is very important-very important indeed! The professor's cor ridor is also lined with cocoanut matting."

"Well, sir, what of that?" "Don't you see any bearing upon the case? Well, well, I don't insist upon it. No doubt I am wrong. And yet it seems to me to be suggestive. Come with me and introduce me."

We passed down the passage which was of the same length as that which led to the garden. At the end was a short flight of steps ending in a door. Our guide knocked and then ushered us into the professor's bedroom.

It was a very large chamber lined with innumerable volumes, which had overflowed from the shelves and lay in piles in the corners or were stacked all round at the base of the cases. The bed was in the center of the room, and in it, propped up with pillows, was the owner of the house. I have seldom seen a more remarkable looking person. It was a gaunt, aquiline face which was turned toward us, with piercing dark eyes which lurked in deep hollows under overhung and tuft ed brows. His hair and beard were white save the latter was curiously stained with yellow around his mouth A cigarette glowed amid the tangle of white hair, and the air of the room was fetid with stale tobacco smoke. As he held out his hand to Holmes I perceived that it was also stained with yellow nicotine. "A smoker, Mr. Holmes?" said he speaking in well chosen English, with a curious little mincing accent. "Pray take a cigarette. And you, sir? I can recommend them, for I have them especially prepared by Ionides of Alexandria. He sends me a thousand at a time, and I grieve to say that I have to arrange for a fresh supply every fort-night. Bad, sir, very bad, but an old man has few pleasures. Tobacco and my work-that is all that is left to me.' Holmes had lit a cigarette and was shooting little darting glances all over the room.

"Tobacco and my work, but now only tobacco," the old man exclaimed. "Alas, what a fatal interruption! Who could have foreseen such a terrible catastrophe? So estimable a young man! I assure you that after a few months training he was an admirable assistant. What do you think of the matter,

"I have not yet made up my mind." "I shall indeed be indebted to you if you can throw a light where all is so dark to us. To a poor bookworm and invalid like myself such a blow is paralyzing. I seem to have lost the faculty of thought. But you are a man of ac tion-you are a man of affairs. It is part of the everyday routine of your life. You can preserve your balance in every emergency. We are fortunate indeed in having you at our side." Holmes was pacing up and down one side of the room while the old professor was talking. I observed that he was smoking with extraordinary rapidity. It was evident that he shared our bost's liking for the fresh Alexandrian cigarettes.

the old man. "That is my magnum opus-the pile of papers on the side ta ble yonder. It is my analysis of the documents found in the Coptic monasteries of Syria and Egypt, a work which will cut deep at the very foundation of revealed religion. With my enfeebled health I do not know whether I shall ever be able to complete it, now that my assistant has been taken from me. Dear me. Mr. Holmes, why, you are even a quicker smoker than I am Holmes smiled. "I am a connoisseur," said he, taking another eigarette from the box, his fourth, and lighting it from the stub of that which he had finished. "I will not trouble you with any lengthy cross examination, Professor Coram, since I gather that you were in bed at the time of the crime and could know nothing about it. I would only ask this: What do you imagine that this poor fellow meant by his last words, 'The professor-it was she?"

The professor shook his head. "Susan is a country girl," said he, and you know the incredible stupidity of that class. I fancy that the poor fellow murmured some incoherent, delirious words and that she twisted them into this meaningless message," "I see. You have no explanation yourself of the tragedy?"

"Possibly an accident, possibly-I only breathe it among ourselves-a sui-Young men have their bidden troubles some affair of the heart, perhaps, which we have never known. It is a more probable supposition than murder."

"But the eyeglass?"

"Ah, I am only a student, a man of dreams. I cannot explain the practical things of life. But still we are aware, my friend, that love gages may take strange shapes. By all means take another eigarette. It is a pleasure to see any one appreciate them so. A fan, a glove, glasses who knows what artiele may be carried as a token or treasured when a men puts an end to his life? This gentleman speaks of footsteps in the grass; but, after all, it is easy to be mistaken on such a point. As to the knife, it might well fequire, be thrown far from the unfortunate man as he fell. It is possible that I speak as a child, but to me it seems that Willoughby Smith has met his fate by his own hand."

Holmes seemed struck by the theory thus put forward, and he continued to walk up and down for some time, lost in thought and consuming eigarette

"Tell me, Professor Coram," he said at last, "what is in that cupboard in the bureau?"

"Nothing that would help a thieffamily papers, letters from my poor wife, diplomas of universities which have done me honor. Here is the key You can look for yourself."

Holmes picked up the key and look ed at it for an instant; then he handed it back. "No; I hardly think that it would help me," said he. "I should prefer to go quietly down to your garden and turn the whole matter over in my head. There is something to be said for the theory of suicide which you have put forward. We must apologize for having intruded upon you, Professor Coram, and I promise that we won't disturb you until after lunch. At 2 o'clock we will come again and report to you anything which may have happened in the interval."

Holmes was curiously distrait, and we walked up and down the garden path for some time in silence. "Have you a clew?" I asked at last

"It depends upon those cigarettes that I smoked," said he. "It is possi ble that I am utterly mistaken. The cigarettes will show me." "My dear Holmes." I exclaimed

"how on earth"-"Well, well, you may see for yourself. If not, there's no harm done. herself in your room." Of course we always have the optician clew to fall back upon, but I take a short cut when I can get it. Ah, here is the good Mrs. Marker! Let us enjoy five minutes of instructive conversation with her." I may have remarked before that Holmes had, when he liked, a peculiarly ingratiating way with women and that he very readily established terms of confidence with them. In half the time which he had named he had captured the housekeeper's good will and was chatting with her as if he had known her for years. "Yes, Mr. Holmes, it is as you say. sir. He does smoke something terrible. All day and sometimes all night, sir I've seen that room of a morning-well, sir, you'd have thought it was a London fog. Poor young Mr. Smith, he was a smoker also, but not as bad as the professor. His health-well, I don't know that it's better nor worse for the smok

"Ah," said Holmes, "but it kills the appetite." "Well, I don't know about that, sir." "I suppose the professor cats hardly

"Well, he is variable. I'll say that for "I'll wager he took no breakfast this morning and won't face his lunch after all the cigarettes I saw him consume." "Well, you're out there, sir, as it happens, for he ate a remarkably big voice, "You are right! I am here." breakfast this morning. I don't know when I've known him make a better one, and he's ordered a good dish of myself, for since I came into that room yesterday and saw young Mr. Smith lying there on the floor I couldn't bear to look at food. Well, it takes all sorts to make a world, and the professor hasn't let it take his appetite away." We loitered the morning away in the down to the village to look into some rumors of a strange woman who had been seen by some children on the Chatham road the previous morning. As to my friend, all his usual energy seemed to have deserted him. I had never known him handle a case in thing of respect and admiration, such a half hearted fashion. Even the news brought back by Hopkins that he had found the children and that they had undoubtedly seen a woman exactly corresponding with Holmes' description and wearing either spectacles or eyeglasses failed to rouse any sign of keen interest. He was more attentive when Susan, who waited upon us at lunch, volunteered the information that she believed Mr. Smith had been out for a walk yesterday morning and that he had only returned half an hour before the tragedy occurred. I could not myself see the bearing of this incident, but I clearly perceived that Holmes was weaving it into the general scheme which he had formed in his brain. Suddenly he sprang from his chair and glanced at his watch. "Two s'clock, contlemen," said he. must go up and have it out with our friend the professor."

The out man had just finished his lunch, and certainly his empty dish bore evidence to the good appetite with which his housekeeper had credited him. He was indeed a weird figure as he turned his white mane and his glowing eyes toward us. The eternal cigarette smoldered in his mouth. He had been dressed and was scated in an armchair by the fire

"Well, Mr. Holmes, have you solved this mystery yet?" He shoved the large tin of cigarettes which stood on a table beside him toward my companion. Holmes stretched out his band at the same moment, and between them they tipped the box over the edge. For a minute or two we were all on our knees retrieving stray cigarettes from impossible places. When we rose again I observed Holmes' eyes were shining and his cheeks tinged with color. Only at a crisis have I seen those buttle signals flying.

"Yes," said he, "I have solved it." Stanley Hopkins and I stared in amazement. Something like a sneer quivered over the gaunt features of the

"Indeed! In the garden?"

"No. bere."

"Here! When?" "This instant."

"You are surely joking, Mr. Sherlock Holmes. You compel me to tell you that this is too serious a matter to be treated in such a fashion. 'I have forged and tested every link of my chain, Professor Coram, and I am sure that it is sound. What your motives are or what exact part you play in this strange business I am not yet able to say. In a few minutes I shall probably hear it from your own lips. Meanwhile I will reconstruct what is past for your benefit, so that you may know the information which I still

"A lady vesterday entered your study She came with the intention of pos-sessing herself of certain documents which were in your bureau. She had a key of her own. I have had an opportunity of examining yours, and I do not find that slight discoloration which the scratch made upon the varnish would have produced. You were not an accessory, therefore, and she came, so far as I can read the evidence, without your knowledge to rob

The professor blew a cloud from his lips. "This is most interesting and instructive." said he. "Have you no more to add? Surely, having traced this lady so far, you can also say what has become of her."

"I will endeavor to do so. In the first place, she was seized by your secretary, and stabbed him in order to escape. This catastrophe I am inclined to regard as an unhappy accident, for I am convinced that the lady had no intention of inflicting so grievous an injury. An assassin does not come un-Horrified by what she had armed. done, she rushed wildly away from the scene of the tragedy. Unfortunately for her, she had lost her glasses in the scuffle, and as she was extremely short sighted she was really helpless without them. She ran down a corridor which she imagined to be that by which she had come-both were lined with cocoanut matting-and it was only when it was too late that she understood that she had taken the wrong passage and that her retreat was cut off behind her. What was she to do! She could not go back. She could not remain where she was. She must go on. She went on. She mounted a stair, pushed open a door and found

The old man sat with his mouth open, staring wildly at Holmes. Amazement and fear were stamped upon his expressive features. Now with an effort he shrugged his shoulders and burst into insincere laughter. "All very fine, Mr. Holmes," said he "but there is one little flaw in your splendid theory. I was myself in my room, and I never left it during the

"I am aware of that, Professor Co :am. "And you mean to say that I could lie upon that bed and not be aware that a woman had entered my room?" "I never said so. You were aware of it. You spoke with her. You recognized her. You aided her to escape," Again the professor burst into high keyed laughter. He had risen to his feet, and his eyes glowed like embers.

"You are mad?" he cried. "You are talking insanely. I helped her to escape? Where is she now?" "She is there," said Holmes, and he pointed to a high bookcase in the corner of the room. I saw the old man throw up his arms a terrible convulsion passed over his grim face, and he fell back in his chaft. At the same instant the bookcase at which Holmes pointed swung round upon a hinge and a woman rushed out into the room. "You are right!" she cried in a strange foreign She was brown with the dust and draped with the cobwebs, which had come from the walls of her hiding cutlets for his lunch. I'm surprised place. Her face, too, was streaked with grime, and at the best she could never have been handsome, for she had the exact physical characteristics which Holmes had divined, with, in addition, a long and obstinate chin. What with her natural blindness, and what with the change from dark to light, she stood as one dazed, blinking garden. Stanley Hopkins had gone about her to see where and who we were. And yet, in spite of all these disadvantages, there was a certain nobility in the woman's bearing, a gal lantry in the defiant chin and in the upraised head, which compelled some-

Stanley Hopkins had laid his hand upon her arm and claimed her as his prisoner, but she waved him aside gently and yet with an overmastering dignity which compelled obedience. The old man lay back in his chair with a twitching face and stared at her with brooding eyes.

"Yes, sir. I am your prisoner," she said. "From where I stood I could hear everything, and I know that you have learned the truth. I confess it all. It was I who killed the young man. But you are right-you who say it was an accident. I did not even know that it was a knife which I held in my hand, for in my despair I snatched anything from the table and struck at nim to make him let me go. It is the truth

"Madam," said Holmes, "I am sure that it is the truth. I fear that you are

She had turned a dreadful color, the