recent "credit panic," and of what he considered the dangers of putting "untutored idealism" in charge of the nation's affairs.

The occasion was a dinner, given by four-score or more of Ulster county democrats, at which Judge Parker said in part:

"We are all members, one of another. Oregon and Maine are linked together if only by so humble a bond as the pine forests and great apple crops. Florida would be no stranger whether she found herself seated under the sacred codfish that hangs in the hall on Beacon street, or sat in a California orange grove. "Pittsburg and St. Louis may interchangeably accept their respective symbolic 'Roosevelt currency,' emblems simultaneously issued under the stress of the great 'credit' panic.

"And here, incidentally, we can for at least one thing thank our present chief executive. He has bound us indissolubly together. He has taught us that untutored idealism, that theory untempered by experience, that callow youthfulness of intellectual development, become dangerous when let loose on an entire community.

"What is wrong with our financial condition? Can anyone say that we are on an unsound financial basis? What is at fault with general mercantile conditions? They are excellent. What visible danger threatens our prosperity? None, so far as we can determine. Whence, then, this abnormal situation which has startled the world and reacted upon every European financial center?

"The answer is to be found in the simple fact that there has been determined attack upon property as such.

"Our actual wealth today staggers the belief of the world. Yet a great unknown, undefined dread—a fear that we shall none of us be allowed to retain the results of our toil, but that in a renewed exploitation of wild theories—theories financial, theories governmental, theories economic—we shall see the wreck of industry, the paralyzation of effort, the destruction of the value of the investments of the entire body politic.

"To whom must we attribute this result? "Now and in the future to any man who, possessed of power, advocates violent and novel experiment with the existent adjustment of human relations, an adjustment which has been the slow outgrowth of all experience and can only be modified carefully, slowly and judiciously.

"Our individual personal burdens, our individual responsibilities, make us all timid. We fear mob rule. We fear riot. We fear revolutionary method. We fear the sudden application of new, untested, unthought-out ideas to the wholesocial fabric.

"He has bound us indissolubly together. He has taught us to rely in the last analysis upon each other and upon ourselves against himself and against all others like him. He has shown us that peace, plenty and prosperity are no guarantees if we guard not our constitutional right by putting in office constitutional rulers. At a time, fortunately, when we could endure it, he has taught us in practice the bitter lesson—that untutored idealism, that theory untempered by experience is dangerous.

"Confidence is lost. Credit is destroyed. Uncertainty and dread reign and this most extraordinary of panics has followed as it would again from similar causes.

"If you ask how credit shall be restored, I can give you but this negative answer:

"Not by a continuance of the possibility of the application to the whole of the country of still other new theories, nor by a continuance at the will of our present ruler or of any like him, of sporadic spectacular attacks, one following another, upon the various forms of invested savings."
