

PRICE OF FALSE HAIR IS SOARING

EUROPEAN MAIDENS WISE TO FACT THAT CROP HAS BIG VALUE.

With the price of false hair going up and the stern decree of fashion that every woman must have at least six little puffs of hair, other than her own, surmounting her coiffure, there is a sound of lamentation in all hair-dressing establishments.

"Why, it's preposterous," said a much-marcelled blonde beauty, leaning over the show case of a fashionable shop and toying with a bunch of fluffy false curls. "Ten for these! A few months ago they were only worth six."

"Yes, madam," the saleswoman explained, "but the demand has increased and the supply has fallen off. Your hair is hard to match. It has tinges of red and drab in it, and both these shades are scarce now."

All the hair-dressers have the same complaint. My lady must have a "rat" made of real imported hair. She must wear a false pompadour or a coronal plait or, even if she foregoes these, there are the essential puffs that top her off, and yet she can't be made to realize that false hair is a positive luxury nowadays.

"Where does the hair come from that helps eke out scanty tresses?" the head of an old-established shop was asked yesterday.

"It is all imported," was the answer. "From Germany and Paris, principally. The German peasants supply a quantity of light hair, and France sends us some of the best shades of brown. Belgium, Alsace and Sweden contribute largely to the American trade. All the hair that comes to this country goes first to Paris, where it is prepared. One firm has a secret process, handed down for generations, whereby the hair is preserved, so as not to lose its color and luster."

"This process is very expensive, and that is one reason why false hair costs so much."

Another reason given for the recent increase in the price of this commodity is that peasants, who were formerly willing to be shorn of their tresses for a mere song, have now grown wise to its commercial value, and won't part with it unless they are given a good round sum.

They have also grown sophisticated, and the American invasion of foreign countries, the opening up of small villages by the trolleys and trains have made peasant women more mindful of their looks.

Formerly she sold her hair for a gaudy shawl or a bit of lace, and covered up her head with a bonnet. Now she knows the value of picturesqueness and finds that it pays better to maintain her good looks.

In Sweden the government has passed a law forbidding the women to part with their hair for commercial purposes.

"What are we to do?" asked the dealer. "There is no substitute for false hair that will wear well and there is no American supply. Why, we get the very best production of the old world. Paris keeps the 'seconds' for French women. During the summer Americans who went abroad took their hair with them."

"That may sound funny, but it's true. Hair is the rage now. French women talk of nothing else. They don't buy hats any more; they buy hair, and pile it on their heads in fantastic styles, puffs, bows and ringlets, making monumental headpieces."

"American women knew this in the spring, and, instead of going to Paris for their hair, as they do for their gowns, they secured it before they went abroad."

"The fad for extra hair is so extreme that women have it sewed into their hats like ribbon, and doff and don it without any hesitation. It used to be that switches were worn only by old persons, or those with scanty tresses; now they are part of every woman's make-up."

"Is it true that the convents sell the hair cut from novices' heads?" the hairdresser was asked.

"Yes, a great deal of the foreign hair comes from convents. There is a general agent in every district, who collects it for the dealers. The nuns sell it and it brings good prices."

"The best grade of hair comes from Brittany and the poorest from Japan. The coarse is used for rats and cheap switches."

The lighter shades of hair are the most expensive. Ash is a pale yellow much sought after and very rare, and drab, a shade of golden brown, is hard to get. Hair with red in it is healthy, and lasts longer than the paler colors, and many fashionable women affect this shade.

Gray hair, the dealer said, is very costly. She showed a three-ounce switch worth $150.

"No, women do not dye or blonde the hair any more. The natural shades are popular, and that adds to

"THE LITTLE PROSPECTOR"

CHIC PERKINS Who Appears in "The Little Prospector" at the Pavilion, on Sunday Night.

"The Little Prospector" is the attraction at the Pavilion on Sunday night, Manager Aylesworth coming here from Goldfield last night to make the arrangements for the production. "Chic" Perkins, the talented young actress, heads the company and she is said to be exceptionally good in the leading role. The production is a typical western melodrama, and is full of life and ginger.

The company played to crowded houses all last week at the Grand opera house in Los Angeles and Mr. Aylesworth has made arrangements for a limited engagement in the gold camps.

The tickets for "The Little Prospector" will be on sale at the Miners' drug store on Sunday morning. The prices will be 50 cents, 75 cents and $1.

our perplexities. Everybody's hair differs in a greater or less degree, and there are so many different kinds of blondes that it is almost impossible to supply them all with curls, switches, pompadours and puffs to match their own tresses.

"And the worst of it all is that these 'crisped snaky, golden locks, the dowry of a second head,' retain their pristine loveliness for such a fleeting period! For three to six months is the average duration of a fluffy bunch of false curls, and yet women are paying fortunes for them."

Utah Smelters Are Overrun With Ore

An unusual condition confronts the mining and smelting industries of this region, and, in discussing it, the first thing to say is that it is not true that the smelters here are refusing to pay cash for the ores they buy. Neither the Silver King Coalition nor any other company has made such a statement, but such inference has been drawn, undoubtedly, from conditions that have arisen. This was made plain yesterday in talks with both smelter and mine managers in this city.

Here is the situation. During the present season the mines of Utah, Nevada, Idaho and other sections of the west have been producing heavier than at any time in the history of mining. The smelting companies have hustled with all the energy at their command to meet the requirements of the industry, and, while their capacities have been materially increased, manufacturing, railroad, fuel, labor and other conditions have been such that it was difficult for reduction companies to handle all the business that has been offered. This has been particularly true, as it has and does apply to the production of sulphide as compared with the output of oxidized ores.

The result has been that the bins, yards and all available places about the smelting works of this valley are now congested with the ores the nature of which does not permit of their handling only as they can be worked up with characters and grades of ore into which and with which they may be mixed to make desirable charges for the furnaces.

To meet this abnormal and unusual condition of affairs, the smelting companies are temporarily compelled to decline much new business and urge upon their regular contracting patrons an easing up in the shipments of grades and classes of ore with which their plants are already congested. To help out the situation, wherever it is possible to do so, ores are being diverted first to one plant and then to another in different parts of the country.

A message from Goldfield Thursday night said the Mohawk had been closed down because the American Smelting Company had refused to pay cash for the ore. In the first place, the Mohawk and other Nevada ores are not purchased by the smelting companies direct. These ores reach the smelters through the sampling mills in the Nevada camps which buy them. By the time they reach Salt Lake or the several other markets in which they are disposed of, they have lost their identity, so it would be impossible to say that a smelting company had refused to pay for Mohawk or any other ore similarly shipped.

But the statement is made here that every lot of ore received and accepted is being settled for in precisely the same manner that settlements have been made all the time. If ore is shipped from Utah, Nevada or Idaho mines to Colorado, Nebraska or other points more remote from the point of production, and shipments than are the Salt Lake plants, it requires just that much longer to get returns. And it evidently follows that in cases where all of the works have loaded up on certain grades of ore and that they are lacking in others there must be a slowing down somewhere till things are straightened out again. These and dozens of other reasons are advanced in smelting circles why producers have been asked to help the situation.
