If you don't know—and out right here the principle of BRASCOLITE is all that counts. And first of all—get this fact down pat. The depolished, white reflecting plane in flat—there's a reason. Long before a Brascolite was put on the market, while trying to perfect by Photometric test the most efficient design, experiments were made with concave reflectors—all shapes of concavity—and discarded in favor of the flat. The flat reflecting plane is a patented feature of the Brascolite. And now are springing up attempted imitations of Brascolites—some with concave and some with convex reflectors (discarded principles)—none with flat reflecting planes, though—that's patented.

Brascolites Hung on Approval.

BAND OF ENGLISHMEN AND AMERICANS RUN GAUNTLET OF DANGER IN CAUCASUS

(By Associated Press.) LONDON, March 2.—The gauntlet of dangers through which a small band of Americans and Englishmen passed in their escape from a copper mining camp in the Caucasus mountains at the time of the outbreak of war between Turkey and Russia is told by A. H. Trotter of Syracuse, N. Y., chief engineer of the company, who has finally reached London. His adventures form one of the most exciting of the minor episodes of the war. The mining village where the party was caught is called Dzansoul, and lies high up in the mountains about 40 miles from the Russian port of Batoum on the Black sea. The defense of these mountain villages was left to only a few companies of Russian police armed with old black-powder rifles. The report that the Turks were advancing in force from the south, and had driven in some of the Russian outposts, reached the village in November, and this was the first news that hostilities had begun. The people in the smelter camp were slow to realize the danger that surrounded them, and took no steps to escape until the American manager of the company, R. T. White, was shot one Sunday morning while on his way from the camp to the mines, some miles higher up in the mountains.

White was riding up the trail when shot suddenly poured upon him from a ridge across a ravine. Both he and his horse were struck, and he fell from the animal, wounded in the leg. From noon until evening he lay in the shelter of the rock, sniped at every time he showed his head. At dusk a party, of which Trotter was a member, sneaked up the trail to effect his rescue. They brought him down to camp, and then sent him to Batoum. The following evening some Russian soldiers, with a battery of three-inch field guns moved up. They stationed two of the guns near the smelter and four others lower down at Kura. Most of the non-combatants of the village left for Batoum, but a small party of Americans and British remained at camp. The situation was not taken seriously, as the Turks were thought to be only a small party of marauders. The next morning when the two Russian guns at the mine opened up at the crest held by the Turks, the infantry which had been increased to about 400 men at the mine, were forced into their trenches by the hot return fire. Of the Russians, only a small band of Cossacks carried modern guns, the reservists having only single shot pieces. The mountain police, who were in the majority, were armed with ancient guns, as said, firing black powder and lead bullets.

The fighting became so intense that Trotter decided to make his escape. On the way down the mountain he often had to take refuge from the fire. At Kura he met a Russian ammunition train, whose officers arrested him as a German spy and seized a package of bank notes he had with him. Meanwhile, however, the Turks had slipped across the crest of the opposite ridge and had begun a surprise attack upon the ammunition train. The horses, which got the worst of it, bolted down the mountain, wrecking as they ran many of the carts of supplies and ammunition. Trotter tried to jump on one of the wagons to escape, but was prodded off with bayonets, and sought cover. When a motor car filled with wounded came by he tried his luck again, but was unable to explain himself, for lack of Russian, and was again bayoneted off the car. The Russian commandant, coming up later in an automobile, gave him safe conduct to Borchka, where the ammunition train was overtaken and Trotter's money recovered. With a temporary pass from the officer, he made his way by rowboat to Batoum. The rest of the English-speaking party at camp, caught in the fighting
