NEW OREBODY ON THE BIG DIVIDE

Gordon Hall, writing in the New York Telegraph, gives particulars of a surface strike made on the Tonopah Divide shortly before the strike took effect. The story is given as follows:

A new ore body of great width and carrying very promising values was opened up on the surface of the Tonopah Divide mine shortly before work ceased on August 17. That this discovery has never been reported is due to the policy of reticence characteristic of the mine management.

Like the original discovery of the Tonopah Divide vein, the new ore body was uncovered by accident.

Early in August some men shooting holes for poles for the power line to the Gold Zone shaft struck what looked like ore and reported the matter to W. Watters, mine superintendent, who put men to work trenching and opened up a width of eighty feet of mineral-bearing formation. At about the center of this a shaft was sunk to a depth of twenty feet, and in this work values of $9.50, $10.20 and $20.50 a ton were disclosed, the highest values being at the bottom of the shaft. Work then ceased on account of the strike.

This new ore body was opened up on the Mammoth claim near the eastern boundary of the company's property and has an east and west course, and if continuous will have a length of about 1,800 feet before intersecting the Divide vein and may explain the "bulge" in the latter vein, where it is ninety feet wide in the southeast drifts.

The new ore discovery is fraught with immense possibilities for the Gold Zone, as on its eastern course it should pass for a length of about 60 feet through the Arkansas claim of that company and thence into the Alto Divide.

The general impression in official circles is that the report is well founded.
