THE ROAD TO HAPPINESS.

There is no great happiness without struggle. It is not the man who has never known sorrow who is the greatest. It is the man who has known sorrow and who has overcome it. It is the man who has known sorrow and who has overcome it. It is the man who has known sorrow and who has overcome it.

PRISON FOR FIENDS.

While the sentences being imposed upon the German war criminals at Leipzig are not so severe as those which might be demanded by the officers, they nevertheless are a substantial step toward the law of nations. The case involved the sinking of the Canadian hospital ship, the Lusitania, in 1915. The court declared that the attack on the lifeboats was to destroy all persons who took part in the efforts to save the ship. It is not an idle message which the poet has for us when he tells us that our strength comes from the lives of men. Every man and woman about us may see examples of the truth of this philosophy.

HONORS FOR HERO.

Jack Munson had a funeral worthy of his heroic service. It was Jack who saved a battalion of American soldiers and himself by Germans in the Ardenne forest at the risk of his life. He came home with the decoration of his own country and of France but when he died recently his body was sent to the morgue from the hospital in New York.

This is how Munson's feat was told in the official citation given when Marshal Potain pinned the Medaille Militaire on his breast:

"To obtain ammunition and rations, Private Munson, with an other private and an officer, ventured to establish communication between his battalion and regimental headquarters. They were attacked by a small party of Germans and one of them was killed. They succeeded in reaching cover, and remained there until nightfall, when they crawled by error into a German camp and lay there for three hours before they were discovered. Private Munson then deliberately drew the fire of the Germans to himself in an effort to save the others, and he succeeded the next morning in reaching the German lines and destination with the message entrusted to him."

Besides the Medaille Militaire which only four American dough-boys won, Munson received the Croix de Guerre with palms, and from General Pershing the Distinguished Service Cross.
