TO JOHN SPARKS AND J. G. SWEENEY

BILL GIBSON used to tell a story about a man in the early days who started to his cabin one evening after spending a social hour with several of his fellow miners in the little camp where he lived.

On his way to his cabin he saw in the middle of the trail ahead of him a skunk, that barred the way and gave every evidence of intention to open hostilities in a moment.

Now, this miner had a reputation as a bear hunter and had many huge hides in his cabin, glorious testimonials to his prowess. This skunk in the road, however, angered him.

He began to consider to himself, while the skunk showed more and more intention to make things ugly for the big bear hunter. In a moment the direction of the wind changed and the bear hunter became aware of the fact that Mr. Skunk was perfectly able to inflict a lot of damage in his own peculiar way.

"Now," thought the miner, "I can give fight to this here skunk, and kill him all right; but what will I do when I go back to camp and try to tell the boys about it. I will smell to high heaven and they will all kick me out for that alone. I think I will just make a little better and leave this here skunk person to smell himself up."

Sniffing the action to the wind, he walked away around the evil smelling animal that had by this time begun to pollute the air with his noxious odors, and did not seem to be in the least bit concerned.

When his comrades heard his story, they applauded his judgment and declared it takes more brains to refuse to fight a skunk than it does to fight all the time.

Bill Gibson is a humorist. The Appeal is glad to say that he was not introduced Saturday as to Dr. Puff-blower's speech in this city Thursday night. He was in Virginia City holding court teaching Carson City early in the morning and returning, on the evening train.

John W. Munn, editor of the Appeal, has been notified that he should have secured publication of this article. When the Appeal did not do so, he was in a position to be gentlemanly in his desire to be omitted as a matter of courtesy with Munn's remarks.
