JONES AND FAIR COMPARED.

The Free Lance publishes the following comparison between two public men. It is a well drawn picture: Not long since a Washington correspondent compared Jones and Fair in Washington. A comparison of the two Senators at their homes would be still more striking. Jones returns a statesman, is met by half a dozen relatives, escorted to his home in Gold Hill in a special car, welcomed by his aged mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, nieces and nephews, whose devoted benefactor he is. A house full of twenty or more proud relatives await his return and lovingly greet him on arrival, fond of him for his many domestic virtues and proud of him for his National reputation as a Statesman. His constituency, irrespective of party, point to him as the greatest of leaders in the councils of thenation.

Fair returns. A lackey may possibly meet him at Reno in a carriage to convey him to a hotel in the town which was once his home, or he is an unhonored passenger on the railway train to Virginia. His former home on B street is deserted, or possibly, guarded by a lone watchman, his wife for causes too well known is divorced from him, his children alienated from him and out from under his influences; not a true friend in all Nevada to grasp him by the hand to welcome him home. Even Dick Dey has gone over to Mackay, Fair's arch enemy. Honorless, friendless, the Senator, not Statesman—returns. His family has deserted him, his corruption of Nevada politics has damned him, his public career is a conspicuous disgrace to himself and the State he misrepresents. In the interest of the good name of the Battle-born State, and for the sake of the self-respect of an intelligent people give us for the next six years a worthy companion to Jones in the United States Senate.

An Honorable Man.
When Reddy was beaten at the Democratic State Convention in California his friends pressed him to run independent; but Reddy is not that kind of a man.

"I submitted by name," said Reddy to a Post reporter, "to the arbitrament of the Democratic Convention; I endorsed the platform and pledged myself to support the candidates of the Convention, whoever they might be. I certainly cannot, as an honorable man, accept a nomination from any other party, and if the Federated Trades should tender me a nomination I do not see how they could have any confidence in me if I accepted after having pledged myself to abide by the decision of the Democratic Convention. Oh, no; it is an impossibility for me to become a candidate after that. I have just reason to be indignant at the manner in which I was defeated, and the treachery of individuals, whose word I had relied upon, but that cannot alter my course from that straightforward, honest promise to abide by the result. So you see, under no circumstances can I be a candidate this year."

There are numbers of people in Carson who will do well to study these words.

The Signs of the Times.
I spoke of the "sage brush politician" but I forgot to speak of the average voter. Well they don't differ much from the ordinary voter of California, except that I notice in the palm of the right hand they have distinctly marked in India ink the parenthetical interrogation point (?), while in the palm of the left hand is plainly inscribed $ which characters, as most know are signs of recognition during the political campaign. Politicians seeing these signs respond appropriately.—E.

Could Not Stand Defeat.
At the Democratic County Convention held at Sonora, California, on the 24th, J. F. Wagner, the present incumbent of the County Recorder's office, was a candidate for re-nomination. He was defeated, and took his failure to secure the prize so much to heart that he committed suicide that evening by shooting himself through the forehead with a revolver.

Hozwash and Gush.
Mrs. Cleveland's weight has been discovered by some brilliant ornament to the profession of journalism, as it is in the United States, to be 146 pounds. The size of her boots and gloves, the cologne she prefers and the tooth powder she uses are all said to be under investigation by the same enterprising young man. He is known to have a clue and to be following it with industry and enthusiasm, and shortly these details, and doubtless more, will be disclosed to an impatient nation.

The Reward of Virtue.
The Enterprise of Sunday, moralizing on the Thomasine case, remarks that if he had led an upright life he "might have attended the picnic at Treadway's Park" instead of being sent to the Penitentiary. The idea of a reward for a stainless life seems to be complete with the Enterprise's local when the picnic train reaches Treadway's Park.

—Nobody will be surprised if the Elko Convention does not close suddenly and catch the tail of Jewett that old political fox. It is reported that the same sort of medicine that he has dished out to others so long will be thrown at him, and in no homeopathic doses either.
