RECEPTION PUNCHES.

Relative Strength of Stewart's and Stevenson's.

Since the Stewart and Stevenson receptions the relative merits of the two have been actively discussed. As almost the same people attended the two receptions and had an equally good time that part of the proposition is settled as a stand off and the talk all centers about the punch bowls.

There was a big punch bowl at both places, big enough to bathe a small boy in, but the punches were not made after the same recipes. The APPEAL has interviewed several members on the subject and gives the results of its investigations.

Senator Hardesty, who is an old Democratic war horse and a judge of punch, was the first man interviewed. He talked freely on the subject.

"I drank both punches and at first I was disposed to think that Stewart's was the chief. It hit quick and fair and you knew where it hit. Stevenson's seemed to me at first to be rather light and lacked directness. I drank one glass and missed the solid rum back ground that belongs to public punch and so let it alone. I thought to myself that it would require too much to have the desired effect. Pounce, I noticed, drank a good deal but the punch had active reserve force that I hadn't counted on. Pounce was as quiet as a mouse next day and so I knew the punch was more speedy than I had set it up to be. It was my mistake in judgment all the time."

Senator Boyle—The punch at Stewart's was a quick hitter and no mistake, but from personal experience I am disposed to think that Stevenson's is more of a stayer. I voted wrong twice next morning after Stevenson's reception and sacrificed considerable of the people's money. It was Stevenson's punch that did the business.

Senator Williams—I did not tackle Stevenson's punch, but I heard of it from Sam Jones. He said it was a quiet mild beverage that was well calculated to deceive and had been knocked out by it. I had the other Senators at a disadvantage next morning and drove 'em to the wall.

Smith of Eureka—Stewart's punch takes no unfair advantage of a man and warns him when to quit. Stevenson's seems a harmless beverage and I thought at first that it was lemonade. But, oh Lord, how it mowed down the Great East. I voted against one of my own pet schemes the next morning and I feel rattled yet.

John Egan—Yes, I tried both punches. I thought that Stewart's had run in—just a dash—and drank but little. Stevenson's was a new deal to me. It didn't seem to exhilarate much that is not that night. For a day or two I saw the Storey boys off their feet and was congratulating myself that I was all right but this morning it began to get its fine work in. I expect to be incapacitated for business all day. If my pet bill comes up, A. B. No. —, please ask some friend to get it back into the Committee until I get straightened out.

Williamson—Lander county seldom gets caught out, but some how the day after Stevenson's reception we were all at sea. Wonder if that innocent looking punch was the at the bottom of it?

Senator Sharon—I didn't drink any punch, but I believe in fair play. Stevenson hadn't any right to ring in any new combination on Storey county. It hit Boyle hard, and Lyman seemed considerably rattled.

Rice—Outin Lincoln we wouldn't stand any of Stevenson's punch. We want a drink that acts the same day so as to have the fun all at once. Stevenson's punch is like an old Government musket that hangs fire. You pull the trigger, no discharge, and you put the gun over your shoulder and start home. Just at the gate the blasted thing goes off and kills a forty dollar hunting dog. I don't like these uncertain hold over drinks.

Senator Noteware—I had a little blow out myself, but I was requested to avoid the Stevenson recipe for punch.

Hugh Mohan—I partook liberally of both beverages, not to excess, however, say fifteen or twenty glasses. I saw nothing in either drink to come up to the old Tammany drinks I took when stumping New York State for Cleveland, hell roast his soul. But, of course, I drank too sparingly at either Stewart's or Stevenson's to really ascertain the nature of the compound.

Alf. Doten—Don't question me on this subject.

George Baker—See Black Wallace and he can give you my experience; he attended me next day.

A. C. Cleveland,—I don't want to be interviewed. I only know that next day I closed a contract with Hardin to deliver 500 steers, two-year-olds, at $8 a head. Don't talk to me about punch now.

Clapp of White Pine—Neither punch fazed me. If men can't stand a little punch they had better stay home.

Senator Foley—I think the hold over Democrats put up the job.

Speaker McDonnell—I am still here.

Tom Riekey—Never mind now; don't want to be interviewed.
