THE CRAWFORD PRIMARIES

A Quiet Contest Between the Candidates.

The candidates were up and stirring yesterday morning all packing the "one indispensable" ticket which according to agreement did not make its appearance until shortly before the polls opened in the morning.

Things went very smoothly until a short time before noon when the North American liar came to the front and began to get in his work. All sorts of stories were paddled from one candidate to another and for a while there was a regular knifeing between the rival candidates and their friends.

Along about the middle of the day it was cut and slash all around and then the candidates got together and began to compare notes. They soon found that they had been all more or less victimized and then they called a truce and began to work for themselves and keep their hands off each other's fight.

All sorts of combinations were rumored as being made on the legislature ticket and it was here that most of the slashing was done.

Every once in a while news came from Empire of how this and that man was being cut and in a little while this source of information brought such conflicting accounts that no one could make head or tale of it and ceased to let it worry them.

Matters were quiet in the afternoon and the candidates began to get jolly and good natured as the time for closing the polls arrived, and each man swore by the eternal horned spoon that he would support his successful rival through thick and thin.

The following is the vote.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our Regular Correspondent.] WASHINGTON, Sept. 14th, 1888.

Senator Hoar made a few pertinent remarks on trusts in the Senate Wednesday. They were made in reply to Senator George, who, in proposing an amendment to the bill suppressing trusts which has just been reported from the finance committee, took occasion to say a word or two too much.

Mr. Hoar started off by alluding to the connection of Cleveland's Cabinet and the Democratic party with trusts. He then said when the Senator from Texas (Reagan) had undertaken to enlighten the Senate (some days since) on the question of trusts he had hoped to get some light as to what these trusts were, where they were, what relations they have to the great political parties, and what likelihood of political danger there was from them. He wished the Senator from Texas (Reagan) or the Senator from Mississippi (George) to tell the Senate what information they had. Was there, for instance, a Standard Oil trust in this country? And, if so, was that trust represented in the Cabinet at this moment? Was it represented in the Senate? Was it represented in the counsels of any important political party? Was there a sugar trust, and were its representatives consulted in the framing of a great revenue tariff bill, and did they have their interests looked after and considered? Why had not the Senator from Texas told the Senate (in his speech on the 16th of August) what he knew about these things? The Senator then mentioned the fact that a great many people believed these two trusts stood in the relation of a treasurer to the Democratic party.

The Senate committee on foreign relations have given some little time to the consideration of the retaliation bill this week, but they have not yet decided upon any action. Cleveland answered the resolution of Senator Hoar, passed in August, asking for copies of any remonstrances which Cleveland had directed to be made to the British government on account of Canadian mistreatment of American fishermen, by sending in an enormous batch of correspondence between the two governments, but there are no remonstrances, or only very weak ones.

General Harrison's manly letter of acceptance has been exceedingly well received here. Nothing but praise is heard for it. It is one of the strongest documents of its kind ever written, and would have given General Harrison a reputation for statesmanship had he not already possessed it. It is in marked contrast to the dodging, apologetic letter of Cleveland, which advocates both protection and free trade. There is no straddling about Harrison's letter. He has opinions, and expresses them in straightforward language upon every question of importance now before the public. Many Democrats here acknowledge that the letter as a state document is far superior to Cleveland's.

The Democrats in Congress are badly demoralized over the returns from the Maine election. They had calculated that Cleveland's retaliation message would gain his party many votes in that State, but the returns show that the gallant Republicans of Maine, under the brilliant leadership of Mr. Blaine, have made gains upon their remarkable plurality of 1884. The result shows two things that the Democrats do not like: first, that the tide of public opinion is setting strongly against Cleveland and free trade; secondly, that Mr. Blaine is working heart and soul for the election of Harrison and Morton. The Democratic leaders already see the shadow of national defeat, consequently they are deep in the slough of despondency.

Cleveland has publicly turned his back upon civil service reform-he has long since done so privately. In his letter of acceptance the subject is dismissed in a six line paragraph.

In the face of hundreds of thousands of uncounted votes cast by the colored men of the South it is the acme of audacity for Cleveland to say in his letter of acceptance that the Democratic party favors giving the colored man all of his rights. If the colored voters of the South had not been deprived of their rights Cleveland would never have been President, and the "solid South" would have been unheard of.

After much wrangling the House agreed to the Senate amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill for the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be reclaimed by irrigation. The appropriation for the purpose was reduced to $100,000.

It the days of dueling were not over the continual personal difficulties in both Senate and House would certainly bring about some, for there is scarcely a day that there is not fighting language used in one or the other House. The responsibility for four-fifths of these rows belongs to Senators and Members from the Southern States.

Senator Allison says that the substitute for the Mills bill will be reported to the Senate next week without fail. He further says that the bill will be passed before Congress adjourns.

The Democrats are hoping and praying that the Senate will not remain in session long enough to pass the tariff bill, which is to be reported next week, and they are starting all sorts of rumors that after the bill is reported the Senate will be willing to adjourn, leaving the tariff question to be settled next winter. Every Republican Senator who has been questioned on the subject declares positively that there will be no adjournment until after the tariff bill is passed, and I am under the impression that the Republicans know more about what they are going to do than the Democrats. It is extremely doubtful whether there will be any adjournment at all this year. R.
