THE STEVENSON WILL CASE.

The Sons Propose to Carry the Fights to the Courts.

The order of Court fixing last Tuesday as the day on which testimony was to be taken in the Stevenson will case was changed to a later date because Woodburn for the plaintiffs was engaged in the Crowley murder case.

The plaintiffs are expecting a citation to appear now at any moment in San Francisco, where preliminary testimony will be taken. Afterwards the case will be transferred to this city. In connection with the case the Examiner publishes the following:

In the latter part of last September Governor C. C. Stevenson, the executive head of the government of Nevada, died at his home at Carson City, and the remains were laid away in Oakland.

After his death his will was filed in Carson City, and its provisions created considerable comment, as he gave only $1,000 cash to his two sons, J. L. and E. G. Stevenson, and the residue of the property goes to his wife. The two sons have begun a contest of the will, and in their petition set forth charges of fraud and undue influence.

The history of the separation from his wife of C. C. Stevenson is well known in Nevada, and was caused by his present widow, against whom the sons are beginning a legal fight.

C. C. Stevenson was her third if not the fourth husband, and when he first met her she was the wife of W. F. Frame, then a time-keeper at the Imperial mine at Gold Hill.

Her maiden name was Ellen Frary—later Mrs. Bernard, etc.—and she is the niece of Mrs. William Hardy of San Francisco. After meeting her in 1879 he became very much infatuated, and sent his wife to her former home in Michigan. She expected him to join her in a few months, when he arranged his business affairs.

A GREAT SURPRISE.

Several months passed and he still made excuses about coming, when one day she received a marked copy of a newspaper in which was advertised a divorce summons, and she was called on to answer in a suit instituted by her husband on the grounds of desertion. She immediately returned to Nevada and instituted divorce proceedings against her husband.

He made no contest and the divorce was granted. Mrs. Frame secured a divorce and the two were married. She first left her husband and went to San Francisco, where she lived a year, when she obtained a divorce from him, his offense being, "kissing the hired girl." Frame made no defense although he was in the city.

The affair caused a great deal of talk at the time, and the two sons, residing with their mother, refused to recognize their stepmother.

Bad blood soon became the rule in the family, and one day there was a hot interview between the old gentleman and his eldest son, J. L. Stevenson. He demanded that his son should recognize his father's new wife and treat her with due respect, but the young man, still smarting under the indignity put on his mother, openly denounced his stepmother and expressed his opinion of the marriage in the plainest of Anglo-Saxon. The two parted in a rage, and the next day the father found that the younger son followed the lead of the elder. After a stormy interview it is claimed that C. C. Stevenson made his will and left his sons $1,000 cash. At the time he estimated his wealth at a million.

The sons claimed that she schemed to bring about a divorce between their father and his first wife by spreading reports which would estrange the two.

AN OLD LOAN.

Before and after the marriage C. C. Stevenson loaned his brother in Michigan from time to time $6,000, taking a mortgage on property, not of his own volition, but upon the continued insistence of his wife. He afterwards said, in view of his brother's straightened circumstances, not to foreclose but Mrs. Stevenson proposes to press the foreclosure to get even on her husband's sister-in-law, who when she visited Michigan, refused to receive her.

Mrs. Stevenson estimates the value of the property to be $30,000, with $30,000 liabilities, but the sons estimate the value at $75,000, and say that a job is on foot to have the property sold and have confederates bid it in at a nominal value.

As soon as the Governor died Mrs. Stevenson gave out that there would be little or nothing left after paying the debts, and told the boys there would be nothing to fight over. They proposed to hire one lawyer to settle up the estate as easily and cheaply as possible and divide the balance, she taking half and the boys half. If there was nothing left, all right, they would be satisfied. She owns property in San Francisco worth $20,000, given to her by Stevenson, and the homestead in Carson.

The plaintiffs claim that all the schemes of the present Mrs. Stevenson against the Stevenson family and the Stevenson estate are concocted by her aunt, who also compelled the burial of the late Governor's body in Oakland instead of Nevada, where he wished very earnestly to be buried.

The boys intend to make a lively fight and there will be some startling developments. William Woodburn and Judge Boardman have been secured for the plaintiff, Trenmor Coffin appearing for Mrs. Stevenson.

Miles Johnson at the Masque.

At the Masque Ball at Empire Thanksgiving night, the most conspicuous figure in the merry throng was our fellow townsman, Miles Johnson Esq.

He sported a Spanish Cavalier costume, with knee breeches and lace cuffs, which showed his Apollonian figure to the best possible advantage.

Whenever he moved among the dancers, whether walking with the stately step of the Ferdinand II reign or floating through the waltz like a sunset mist from the Bay of Fundy, he was everywhere the same incomparable effect, the one and only.

It was hard work for the orchestra to build the music up to appear in conformity with the splendid figure of Miles Johnson, but they did it—at times.

Mr. Johnson has a pose and carriage when he moves in a ball room that no disguise can hide from the beaming eyes of appreciative woman or the lynx optic of the APPEAL's Empire society reporter.

Carson Won.

On Thanksgiving night some poker sharps inveigled a Carson gambler into a game of draw and transplanted a cold deck on him. They made him with three kings, while they took unto themselves three each of aces, queens and jacks. Thinking they had an amplitude they stacked up 400 and odd dollars even money.

The victim, when he came unto the draw, let go of a tray and six, and behold he drew a tray and four.

Then he communed with himself and slid the discarded tray back to his hand, severing his connection with the four spot.

There he was, king full on trays, and don't forget it, and had better as three of a kind.

Then the other fellows rose up to make some fist cuffs, but with his gun from the hip pocket produced, he converted the stakes into his other pocket with much accuracy and alacrity.
