FROM CHICAGO.

(Concluded from yesterday.) Chicago, Oct. 26th, 1893.

In Great Britain's section two water-colors pleased me as much as any of the oil paintings did. They are both by J. H. Henshall; one is called "In Wonderland," the other "Merry is the Time When the Heart is Young." They are both of little girls; one before a fire in a chair, the other lying on the floor playing. Both are strong in handling, rich and full in color and altogether the nearest to the effect of oil of any that I saw. There were ever so many landscapes and marines in this section of great excellence but they never can impress one as good figure painting will do.

Great Britain has also gone much into religious and historic art. This sort of pictures interest many people and seem to win the coveted medals but I thought that many of them lacked the essentials of real "high art." One English artist Marcus B. Stone has many paintings there, after the style of those two of his which have been reproduced so often, called "In Love" and "The Peacemaker." They are all very similar in general effect and are all good.

The Germans have a large number of marines which are the equals of any in the whole building. Their effects of wave motion and color with the reflected lights and foam are unusually fine. In this section I saw Karl Kahler's picture "My Studio." This is the now famous painting which the artist slashed with a knife. The gash is painfully apparent. It is strange to listen to the various wild and extravagant accounts, by observers, of why this extraordinary act was performed. I heard half a dozen stories in about as many minutes. I knew Mr. Kahler very well in San Francisco and often saw the picture there, so that comments upon it interested me deeply. I may add that the picture is still a fine thing. Kahler's picture of 44 angora cats called "My Wife's Lovers" is in the California building where it attracts much attention and admiration.

I have said that the U. S. exhibit is too large—I now find that from the myriads of pictures I have great difficulty in making selections to mention individually. Everywhere could be found attractive pictures by the prominent artists. The best things in the exhibit are landscapes and most of the real fine pictures were either painted in France or at least by men who have studied there. I am conscious of leaving out many names and pictures which I should like to mention—as I must do in every section—but this letter is already of mammoth proportions. In the black and white drawings and paintings, most of which were made for illustrations in our magazines, we are abreast of the older countries as to execution and originality. These with etchings etc. are so numerous that I shall only say of them that to one who had the time it is interesting and profitable to see the originals of the pictures, by our best known illustrators, which have appeared in all the weekly and monthly publications, with which everyone is familiar, and it is also interesting always to study etchings.

There are so many fine marbles and bronzes in the department of sculpture that I am again precluded from anything like a mention of them. Our own country has done work in this branch of art, of which we should all be proud. France and Italy are ahead as usual. Two of my favorite pieces are from Italy. One is called "American Mythology." It is by A. Appoloni. It is a marble figure of a nude woman holding a telephone to her ear. The pose and contour are splendid and as it is tinted a delicate flesh color it is a most beautiful thing.

Another represents "Fortune." It is only plaster cast of the original and I can not find the artist's name at this time, but I thought it the most dainty and exquisite piece that I saw at all. In the loan collection a tinted group by Gerome called "Pygmalion and Galatea" was among the most charming marbles.

There were many statues of heroic size, many that were mere ivory miniatures but from the smallest to the largest one found the realism of art in her loveliest form. The countless numbers only impressed one more deeply with the triumph of man's achievements and before one backs slowly out at the entrance for the last time, his eyes must turn to linger fondly upon the grandest aggregation that ever yet was grouped under the roof of a modern Palace of Art. Hard Lines.

The sub-editor of the APPEAL attempted to stop a runaway horse the other evening by jumping in behind and grabbing the reins. Just as he prepared to jump, somebody yanked the horse to a standstill by the bridle and the buckboard, coming to a sudden stop, a foot, more or less, of the iron railing around the bed of the vehicle was driven up into his stomach, inflicting a bruise which looks like a faded chrysanthemum. Today he is suffering from concussion of the asparagus. It is pretty hard lines to be thus rudely rebuked when attempting to do the hero act. We wouldn't turn our hand over to stop a runaway baby carriage after a deal like this.
