MODERN WARFARE.

The latest sensation in the military circles of Europe is the bullet-proof coat which has recently been tested by a number of army experts. The inventor, Heinrich Dowe, is being talked about more than any man in the old world at present, says the Chicago Herald.

Herr Dowe has spent several years in perfecting this new armor, and now seems to have brought it to the highest perfection. In the earlier part of March, this year, he had his bullet-proof coat tested on a semi-private shooting range near Berlin. A large number of people were present, chiefly newspaper men, military officers and representatives from the various German gun clubs. In order to thoroughly demonstrate the resisting power of the coat, the same rifles were used against three-inch planks and steel plates. The targets were placed at a distance of 575 feet. Several of the best make of rifles were used, among them the Mauser, Martini and Winchester, though the small calibre infantry rifle known as "model 88" was used the most. The targets, made of steel and wire plates two-fifths of an inch in thickness, backed by three inches of wood were perforated with ease. After this had been proved a wooden dummy with the bullet-proof coat was put up, and after receiving not less than fifteen shots was found to be without a mark, all the bullets having buried themselves in the composition of the coat without penetrating it once. All present were highly pleased with the result and Herr Dowe was warmly congratulated on his success.

But it was two weeks ago that the inventor achieved his greatest success. He had interested Count Schouvaloff of the Russian Embassy in his invention, and this gentleman said he would like to make a test, provided the tailor would wear the coat while being shot at. To this Dowe unhesitatingly consented and the test was made before a brilliant gathering of military men. The experiments were of the most searching and severe order, and after revolvers had been used on the invulnerable rifles were brought into action. As a preliminary experiment a few shots were fired at a block of solid oak, which was pierced by the bullets, and the best made steel cuirasses were shot through as if they had been made of paper. After this had been done Dowe again donned his bullet-proof coat and invited the Count and his friends to blaze away. It was indeed very exciting while the rifle (one of the most approved patterns used in the German army), was being aimed at the tailor. The spectators were strung to an extreme state of nervousness and instinctively closed their eyes in anticipation of seeing Dowe killed. But after the report of the rifle rang out and the tailor was seen standing, apparently unhurt, there was a feeling of relief among all present. Dowe keenly enjoyed their anxiety and fairly beamed with satisfaction as he shouted: "Fire again; you cannot hurt me!" A bullet was then fired from a Winchester rifle directly over his heart, but did no more harm than if it had been a spitball. The festive tailor was absolutely unhurt and all the bullets were found imbedded in the bullet-proof coat.

A second series of experiments was then commenced, which proved fully as interesting as the first. It is proposed that the cavalry of the future shall be protected by the wonderful material invented by the tailor of Mannheim. So a horse was equipped with a bullet-proof coat. A number of shots were fired at the animal, but they did not seem to annoy the equine half so much as an equal number of self-respecting horse flies who in blissful serenity while the rifle balls "plunked" themselves harmlessly in the wonderful coat. To a question from a naval officer present if this armor could be successfully applied to war vessels, Dowe replied that any vessel supplied with a sheeting of his bullet-proof material would become impervious to the heaviest guns of the heaviest modern ironclads. This may sound a little bombastic, but seeing that he has carried out his theory in regard to a bullet-proof coat for soldiers he might evolve something equally successful for covering warships.

Dowe has placed the coat he wore while being fired upon, on exhibition, as well as the solid pieces of oak which were penetrated by bullets that were harmless against his coat. The new garment looks like ordinary army clothing material, the resisting secret substance being placed beneath the outside cloth.
