Nearly Had a Fire.

Fumigation day a citizen had a narrow escape from burning his house up. He placed the sulphur in a tin can, but neglected to put the can in a tub of water according to directions. In a little while he went to see how the fumigating was progressing and found that the solder had melted, which caused the can to fall apart and drop the sulphur on the floor. A considerable hole was burnt in the floor and a fine prospect for a burnt up house. He didn't lose any time supplying the missing water.

Town Fumigated Friday.
Friday as requested by the Mayor was set aside by everybody as fumigation day and beginning at ten in the morning the citizens began burning sulphur in their homes and places of business. It was thought that with everyone fumigating at the same time that the sulphur fumes would be very annoying, but such did not prove to be the case.

The Cane Crop.
La. Planter and Sugar Manufacturer. Our correspondents throughout the sugar district report this week that the cane continues to grow under favorable weather conditions and that the prospects continue very good for a large crop. Vigorous development is apparent in the canes and the planters seem satisfied and free of apprehension, except that they anticipate trouble in getting labor enough to handle the crop expeditiously. In fact the labor problem in the sugar district promises to be very serious.

No Cause for Alarm.
St. Louis Star-Chronicle, Aug. 16.
Funny what fools a panic will make out of plain, ordinary sensible men and women, isn't it? Take this yellow fever scare, for instance. New Orleans and some other Southern cities has the disease. In other cities which have escaped the pest, grim-faced men, armed with Winchester's, guard the railway stations and threaten to shoot down healthy men and women, whose only offense is that they may have passed through the afflicted cities.

True, there are over a thousand cases in New Orleans alone, with something like 150 deaths. This gives a death rate of about 15 per cent. Sounds pretty bad, doesn't it? But stop and think a moment.

New Orleans is a city of 300,000 people. According to statistics, there are at least 2,500 victims of consumption there, and the death rate from consumption is over 80 per cent. Yet there is no panic over consumption, which is contagious, while yellow fever is not.

Typhoid fever is always more or less prevalent, and people are so accustomed to it that cases are seldom reported. Yet the death rate from typhoid is 38 per cent.

Ever hear of a panic over typhoid? Medical science knows that the sputum from one victim of consumption, thrown into the street, spread broadcast by the wind and inhaled by pedestrians, is enough to inflict the disease upon thousands of healthy persons. Yet we take no precautions to avoid the danger.

It knows that the deadly typhoid germ in a city's water supply will infect thousands who drink it.

It knows that the only way yellow fever can be transmitted is by the bite of a mosquito within a certain time after it has bitten a person already suffering from the disease.

It has demonstrated that the mosquito can be exterminated, and in the meantime it is a simple thing to prevent being bitten by one.

The conclusion is apparent. Exterminate the mosquito and keep cool. There is no sane reason for the slightest fear of yellow fever, and a panic is a childish superstition unworthy of twentieth century men and women.
