TAKE CARDUI

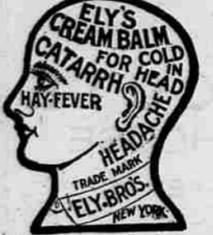

It Will Help You

Cardui is a medicine that has been found to act upon the cause of most women's pains, strengthening the weakened womanly organs, that suffer because their work is too hard for them.

It is not a pain "killer," but a true female remedy, composed of purely vegetable ingredients, perfectly harmless and recommended for all sick women, old or young. Try Cardui. Women's Relief.

Stories of Colorado and The Rocky Mountains

GRAPHIC ACCOUNT OF ONE MAN'S SUMMER OUTING.

(By Lane Orrick.)

Railway corporations, aided and abetted by the National and State Governments, are today disseminating more useful information concerning outdoor sports and general recreation than is sent forth to the world by all the hotel proprietors, lake resort keepers and forest reserve custodians in the country combined. In the first place, a railroad must nowadays be ready and willing to give such information, reliable in character and minute in detail, to the prospective traveler. The State and National Governments supply fish eggs and fry, propagate and protect wild game and inform the public what it is doing through the prescribed channels of periodical official reports. So the three work together for the common good.

The writer recently came across a little booklet, just the size of an ordinary letter envelope, and bearing on the front cover the title "Fishing, Hunting and Camping in the Colorado Rockies." It was not with any languid feeling that I started reading the subject matter between the covers, but I confess at the beginning I had just a trace of prejudice, feeling that I was going to read an out and out advertisement. I was refreshingly disappointed. While the book was issued by the Colorado Midland Railway, I did not find a single one of those familiar references to the fact, alleged or otherwise, that this road was "the best ever," etc., etc. On the contrary,

Divide west of Leadville, and fished the entire length of the famed "Frying Pan" river, about thirty miles in all. This stream runs down a narrow valley and between lofty peaks. The trout here are "dead game," in the vernacular of the fisherman, and one weighing two pounds will give the angler a tussle that is pretty apt to cause him to exaggerate in telling about it if he isn't real careful. It requires from ten minutes to half an hour to land him, dependent upon the angler's knowledge of the trout's fighting propensities and the distance from the rod where the fish takes the fly. We found splendid rustic hotel and camping facilities all along the Frying Pan River; also available furnished cabins. From Thomasville we journeyed on horseback to Wood's Lake, a distance of seven miles from the track. Here P. J. Englebrecht runs a rustic hotel and rents furnished cabins and cottages for housekeeping. We put in a week there, leaving our heavy baggage in care of the agent at Thomasville. The sport there was fine, though we organized a Fishermen's Amateurs club, with several prominent persons as charter members—but it would be telling tales out of school to go into details. After a short sojourn at Glenwood Springs, where we stopped at one of the prettiest and best conducted hotels in the world, "The Colorado," and enjoyed many a plunge in the mammoth hot water pool, we went to Rifle and outfitted for a trip to the deer country, some forty miles north of that point. This was the last week in October. Of the seven in our party, five returned with a trophy in the form of a deer. We rode the range with cowboys in the great annual cattle "round-up" which was being held in that vast country; we breakfasted, dined and supped with them wherever they pitched camp, relishing our meals out of the plates, squat and cross-legged on the ground around the camp-fires. To know and appreciate what real Western hospitality means, one must spend a little time on the range with the Colorado cowboy. One unfortunate incident marred the trip, but this was quickly righted when explanations were offered. One of our party, with the best of intentions, offered the round-up foreman money in compensation for our accommodations. The offer was taken as an insult, which was promptly resented. An apology was made and accepted, and the man who proffered the gold learned something about the real cowboy which will stand him in good stead in future.

Colorado is all that is claimed for her by her most enthusiastic admirers, but the state was wrongly named—it should have been christened Paradise.

(Editor's Note:—We are informed that the booklet referred to in the above article is sent free upon application to C. H. Speers, general passenger agent, Colorado Midland Railway, Denver, Colo.)

WIDOW TABOR'S HOG.

By M. QUAD.

(Copyright, 1903, by T. C. McClure.)

When Silas Strong, old bachelor, bought a farm in the outskirts of the village of Fowlerville and set up his bachelor's hall he was at peace with all mankind. Two weeks later he was rushing to and fro with a pitchfork in his hands seeking the life of a strange hog that had invaded his premises. For four years the Widow Tabor, down in the village, had owned a hog. For three years the animal had been known as "the widow's hog," to distinguish him from the half hundred other hogs permitted to meander around. The villagers told tales about that hog. He was tall and long and rangy. He was ever hungry. He was a fighter. He was a destroyer of gardens and the happiness of the owners thereof. He deserved death by the hands of gun, ax or club, but he had been spared because he was owned by a widow.

The widow's hog had waited a reasonable length of time and then paid a visit to the newcomer and roosted up half an acre of potatoes. Silas Strong was slow to anger, but he couldn't stand that. After vainly trying to catch the hog he set himself to locate the owner. When this had been done he put on his Sunday suit and made a call. He had the damages figured up and knew just what he was going to say. The Widow Tabor wasn't expecting him, but she was not a bit frustrated. Mr. Strong had hardly begun his story of infamy on the part of the hog when he was interrupted with:

"Dear, dear me, but I am so sorry. I wish he wouldn't act this way. Mr. Strong, I have just been making some elderberry wine, and I wish you would give me your opinion on it."

When he had done so she asked another opinion about blackberry jam, and from that she insisted that he sample a custard pie, and when he finally started home he had forgiven the hog and had a good opinion of the widow. These sentiments were not lasting. Only a week had passed when the same hog tore his way through a stout fence and did some more rooting.

Silas Strong was stirred to the uttermost by the outrage. The widow and the hog shared his invectives alike. As soon as he could get his breath and breakfast he set out for the village.

He may have been expected, for the door was opened to him with a sweet smile, and before he could utter a word the widow said:

"I am very glad to see you. One of the legs of the cook stove has fallen out, and I do wish you'd fix it for me."

The leg was no sooner in place than the widow mentioned that she was afraid the "mother" in the vinegar barrel on the sunny side of the house was dead, and she took Silas out to see. He gave his opinion, and then she asked his advice about keeping Lechon chickens instead of Brahmas, and the upshot was that he went away without bringing the thumpers of heaven upon her head. He got as far as to say that the hog had paid him another visit, but she changed the conversation to the coming circus, and he found himself on his way home in a puzzled frame of mind. He wanted to forgive the widow without forgiving the hog; but as they seemed to be one and inseparable how was it to be brought about? Silas bothered over this matter for ten days and then got up one morning to find another battlefield before his eyes. The widow's hog had made the third unannounced visit. He had rooted up the soil, and he had chewed up things. He had spared neither eye nor ear. It was simply a gigantic feast of malicious trespass and deserved death at once. As Silas could not catch him and administer the death stroke, he took a bite to eat and then started for Liverpool, a village five miles away. As soon as he got there he laid the widow and the hog and the trespass before the lawyer, and when the latter had got the details he said:

"It's the plainest case I ever had. The hog has got to die."

Silas Strong felt an elation as he started home. The law was vindicated him, and the law was to vindicate him. He had given the widow and her hog a chance, but they had not taken advantage of it. At the end of a mile or so, however, this elation began to lose its edge, and ten minutes later he was wishing that he hadn't been so prompt. Durn the hog, but Mrs. Tabor was a widow. She had given him pleasant greeting. She had asked his advice. She had fed him custard pie. She may have been left that hog as a heritage, and she couldn't be expected to either kill him or follow him around nights. Silas was feeling rather ashamed of his movements when he came upon a female sitting on the bank of the highway and weeping. Standing in the middle of the road was an old horse and buggy belonging to a party in Fowlerville. The harness had broken, and the outfit had come to a standstill. The woman was recognized at once as the Widow Tabor. As Silas descended from his rig she rose up and tearfully welcomed him.

It was the duty of Silas Strong to comfort her. He did his duty, some of it with an arm around her waist. He had forgotten hogs and lawyers and cases of trespass when he saw a man driving up whom he recognized as a constable. He was on his way to Fowlerville to serve the summons.

"Fight as well turn around," announced Silas.

"But why?"

"A feller can't sue his own wife, can he?"

And the constable sighed and drove on.
