California Fruit.
In Alameda county there are five large canneries, four of which are in operation this season. The fifth is not putting up fruit, but is being utilized as a can manufacturing establishment. The combined output of the Alameda county canneries is large, being about 500,000 cases per year. The total fruit pack of California is estimated at 3,000,000 cases, so it will be seen that the canneries of this country contribute one sixth of the total quantity. In addition to the pack of fruit there is also a large vegetable pack, amounting to 100,000 cases a year.

Although Alameda county is a large producer of fruit and vegetables the strongest inducement for the establishment of canneries here is not the proximity of the orchards, but the available labor supply. During the busy season the two canneries of the California Fruit Canners' association employ 1200 hands, 700 in Oakland and 500 in San Leandro. Although the work is considered hard, most of the operatives employed are women and girls, and those who become experts make good wages. Some earn as high as $2.50 and $3 per day, and the slowest make $1 per day.

In the Alameda county canneries, as well as those of other cities, a large part of the pack consists of apricots, peaches, and pears. Cherries and plums are also canned in considerable quantities, besides currants and other small fruits. The canning of vegetables, particularly tomatoes and peas, has become a great industry, and both of these products are grown in great abundance in Alameda county. Indeed, it might be said that about all the tomatoes used in the canneries of San Francisco, as well as Oakland, are produced here. The total output of tomatoes is estimated by a representative canner as 500,000 boxes of sixty pounds each, which would amount to 15,000 tons.

The canning season, which begins with the packing of peas, about the middle of May, continues through the summer and fall months until the end of October, when the run is finished with tomatoes. Cherries, apricots, peaches and plums are put up, the successive crops coming in in the order mentioned. From June to September 1 is the busiest season, and during these three months the canneries are rushed and generally take all the laborers they can get.—Oakland, (Cal.) Enquirer.

How the General Saved Jim.

This story happened in Georgia in the peace which followed the terrible war. It illustrates the love that so many of the old slaves had for their masters, and how that love was shown.

A negro man, strong and healthy, but getting gray from years, was on trial in one of the county superior courts for murder. He had killed another negro and had been lying in jail for some time awaiting his trial. The testimony against him was given. When the case was called for trial by the presiding judge, an old man arose and in a voice deep and low but full of marked gentleness, said, "Will your Honor please mark me for the defense?"

It was General Robert Tombs, of Georgia. His face was wrinkled some with age, but it was large and strong, and the lines of intellect made deeper wrinkles than those of age. His hair was white but it rolled back in baby curls from the most splendid brow that ever graced a man. His form was tall and straight, and full sized, though his movements were slow with the years. His eyes still flashed as when he stood in the Senate chamber at Washington.

The case was tried. The witnesses all seemed unfriendly towards the prisoner. In his own statement he claimed that the killing was in self defense.

General Tombs addressed

the court and jury at the last and after fully discussing the testimony of the witnesses, he concluded thus:

Your Honor, please, and gentlemen of the jury: "A few years ago my only brother fell wounded on the battlefield of Gettysburg. He lay there bleeding to death, with no friendly hand to help him. Shot and shell, the fierce fiery stream of death, were sweeping the earth about him. No friend could go to him, no surgeon dared approach him. The singing bullets and the wild music of the shells was to be his only requiem. My brother had a body servant, a negro man, who waited on him in camp. This negro saw his master's danger, and straight out into the sheet of battle and flame and death he went. A cannon shot tore the flesh from his breast, but on he went, and, gathering my brother in his arms, the blood of the man mingling with the blood of the master, bore him to safety and to life. Jim open your collar!"

And the jury saw on Jim's breast long, jagged scars where the shell had ripped its way.

Continuing, Gen. Tombs said: "Jim's skin may be black; he may be a negro; but the man who did what Jim did for my brother has a soul too white ever to have killed a man, except in defence of his own life."

Jim was cleared.—Columbia State.

Necessity of Reading.

The fall and winter is now upon us and the Agricultural Economist says:

As the evenings lengthen and there is leisure time the subject of reading matter is or should be more prominent. It is now a recognized fact that the farmer to be successful cannot follow the same old beaten path of two or three generations before him. Competition has increased; brains have supplanted brawn; and the educated farmer is as much a necessity as an educated minister or lawyer.

The pristine fertility of the soil is exhausted and chemistry is called upon to supply the deficiency, the natural equilibrium of the animal world has been disturbed by the slaughter of the birds and other causes, and the practical entomologist is summoned to the rescue; a new plant appears in our midst, and its nature and habits call forth an interest in botany. In short, agriculture, in its highest sense, is inseparable from science. What is to be done?

Farmers who have reached middle age can not as a rule leave their homes to enter one of the numerous agricultural colleges. But are they to be barred utterly from the advantage of these institutions? Not at all. The agricultural papers have admirably solved the problem by adapting to their needs the general principals of scientific farming, popularizing the subject so to speak, and thus bringing it within the grasp of all.

The teacher who is not sufficiently interested in school work to take an educational paper is in some places debarred from employment; and the agriculturist who fails to read regularly at least one standard farm paper loses many times the subscription price. It is his text book, one of the essential tools of the trade. It is a substitute for the education he will give to his children in the higher schools. Read exhaustively on a subject, says a popular lecturer, if you would remember; a desultory reading results in a mass of unclassified matter, not easily retained in the mind.

If the farmer and his family would each year resolve to study into the principles of some particular subject, they would be astonished at the advantage and pleasure derived from it.
