

We Thank You

We desire to extend our thanks to the public for the generous patronage with which we have been favored the past year. Considering the business depression that has been prevalent throughout the country, we feel that our friends have favored us beyond our anticipations or even our hopes. We are indeed more than grateful to you all.

During the coming year we will endeavor to serve you in the same faithful and conscientious manner that has been our policy throughout our business career, and we respectfully solicit a continuance of your confidence and support.

And now let us wish you and yours a prosperous year in 1916, with health and happiness in unlimited measure.

ONE SET OF BRAINS ENOUGH

Clever Man Makes Mistake When He Takes to Wife Clever Woman, Says Writer.

The wife of one of our most celebrated literary men said the other evening that a talented man should always choose a wife with nothing further than domestic accomplishments. "It is a great mistake for brainy people to marry brains," said she decisively, "according to London Tit-Bits, and, happily, few of them do it. Put two geniuses together in matrimony, and you have put two cats in a bag—nervous, fretful, irresponsible creatures, with no patience and less common sense, who will be always worrying each other and tugging in opposite directions at the matrimonial chain. If they are both talented in the same line they will wear each other out in the expression of different ideas; but if they have separate abilities, there will be pretty often a jangle about which one is the more important. What a clever man wants is a clear-headed, sensible wife, who will forget his vagaries in remembering his brilliancy and remain a constant shield between his sensitiveness and disagreeable things; something, in fact, like one of those cushions that sailors put down on the side of the vessel to keep it from jarring too roughly against the dock. Look at me, for instance; I never wrote a word for publication, painted a picture, composed music or did anything clever in all my life. But I make my husband just the sort of wife he needs."

Gets His Soup at Sea.

Because he is bound for London, where it is impossible to secure a supply of the special seaweed out of which a soup is made that is especially favored by his countrymen, Captain Takai of the Japanese steamer Kenkon Maru No. 8, appealed to the customs officials, the Philadelphia Record says. As a result Captain Harai of the steamer Senju Maru, also Japanese, was given permission to transfer to Captain Takai a portion of his supply of the delectable dainty without which the voyage would be a dismal one for him and his crew. Captain Harai is homeward bound and can soon replenish his stock.

The seaweed in question is found only in the Orient, and it contains a gelatinous substance which thickens the soup, and has a peculiar appeal to the oriental palate. In fact, the Japanese sailor claims there is nothing else so good in the soup-making line. It is found by fishermen at the bottom of the sea and, washed and dried, it finds ready sale in China and Japan.
