SERIOUS DISEASE OF CATTLE IN THE WEST

FIVE STATES ARE PLACED UNDER QUARANTINE AS RESULT.

Foot and Mouth Malady Causes Much Apprehension Among Stockraisers. Farm to Farm Inspections Being Made By Inspectors.

Washington, Nov. 2.—Federal quarantine to check a dangerous outbreak of foot and mouth disease among cattle in the middle west was extended by the department of agriculture today to include Pennsylvania, Indiana, Michigan and Illinois and virtually placed Ohio under the same restriction.

It affects the Union stock yards of Chicago, greatest cattle market of the world, to the extent that no live cattle may be shipped from there during the duration of quarantine, even to another infected area. Under the official interpretation of the order, cattle from other areas than those under quarantine may be shipped to the Chicago yard, but they leave there only as dressed meat.

Action Explained.

After a day of conferences among officials here and exchanges with field agents throughout the affected areas this explanation of the government's action was issued at the department of agriculture:

The quarantine of livestock on account of outbreaks of the foot and mouth disease has been extended to cover the entire area of the states of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois and Pennsylvania. In addition, restrictions have been placed upon shipments of stock from Ohio. The order extending this quarantine was signed by the secretary of agriculture November 2, and goes into effect immediately.

The provisions of this quarantine are practically the same as those previously announced for a few counties in Michigan and Indiana. No cattle, sheep or swine can be shipped from these states in interstate commerce and all fodder and animal products of every sort which might possibly convey the disease must be thoroughly disinfected.

Strict Restriction.

The quarantined states are not only prohibited from shipping cattle to uninfected areas, but they cannot even send shipments of stock from one infected area into another.

No cases of foot and mouth disease have as yet been discovered in Ohio, but because of the fact that shipments from the infected area have been made to this state, it has been found necessary to place practically the same restrictions upon interstate shipments from Ohio as on those from the four other states.

One instance of foot and mouth disease has been found among the stock exhibited at the national dairy show in Chicago. In order to prevent the spread of the infection, the other animals are now guarded by sheets saturated with disinfectants and inclosing the stalls, in much the same way as human patients are isolated in hospitals.

Other rigid precautions in regard to the food and bedding of the stock also have been put in force. The federal authorities in charge of the quarantine are earnestly urging every farmer to report at once any suspicious case of sore mouths and lameness among his stock. This is regarded as absolutely indispensable if the disease is to be stamped out. Unreported cases of disease may result in spreading the infection over areas which could otherwise be safeguarded. Persons who have recently received shipments of cattle from the infected areas should at once isolate them. The disease takes only from four to six days to manifest itself, so that this precaution should cause but very little inconvenience.

Originated in Michigan.

This epidemic, it was stated, was originated in Southern Michigan in August, but was not discovered until October 15, when county quarantines were applied to check it. It was found, however, that milk from infected cattle had been sent to dairies and the skim milk returned to the farmers and fed to hogs, transmitting the disease. Hog shipments of that character were sent to the Chicago yards and as sporadic cases of the disease began to appear in various sections of the four states named, its origin was attributed to stockers and feeders sent out from the yards to be fattened on farms.

Department officials explained today the spread of the disease was extraordinarily rapid. It is so highly contagious that cattle passing through pens and alleyways where infected livestock have preceded them acquire the infection.

Drastic measures in the way of cleaning and disinfecting all pens, pens and loading docks have been ordered. So far the number of cases reported has been comparatively small, but they are scattered far apart and since the Chicago yards form the hub of a vast wheel of cattle movements, officials fear the outbreak may be widespread.

Little Known to Farmers.

The foot and mouth disease is little known to farmers and it is said its first appearance in Michigan was not promptly reported, the cattle being treated with salt and disinfecting washes. This held its spread in check somewhat until the infected hogs carried it to the Chicago yards.

A big corps of federal inspectors already is at work in Michigan and Indiana and another in Illinois. A third corps is being mobilized in the Pennsylvania and Ohio districts. These men are making farm-to-farm inspections, besides enforcing disinfection precautions. They take every care to keep from carrying the disease with them, wearing rubber garments and undergoing fumigation after each visit.

The disease is not fatal, but the only way to prevent its spread through the herd is to kill affected animals. Its effect is to emasculate beef cattle and reduce the milk supply of dairy animals.

Officials said it was impossible to predict the duration of any of the quarantine orders. As infected sections are determined and localized, other parts of each state will be freed of restrictions.

It is understood that the order as originally contemplated would have prohibited all shipments of cattle into the quarantine districts. As issued, however, the prohibition applies only to shipments of livestock out of the sections under quarantine, or shipments from one point to another within the quarantine lines.
