THINGS THAT HURT.

It hurts to have a strange dog suddenly introduced into a herd of cows when none has been there previously. If you are going to have a dog at all, start early with the calves and let them grow up accustomed to the sight of him.

The other day a dog came along behind my cows. I keep none myself. The dog was minding his own business, but one of the heifers seemed to consider him a suspicious character, and she set out to get away from him. She ran about half a mile at the top of her speed and all the rest of the cows after her. Result: A lot of excited cows, milk below par in the point of quantity and inferior in quality. Costly dog. Costly milk. No pay in such doings.

Another harmful thing—hired man tired, a cow switches her tail in his face. He yells like a Comanche Indian. The cow snorts and gets her head as high as the top of the barn, perhaps she steps a little away from the milker. Hired man yells some more and swears a few rounds. Things growing worse. Other cows begin to stop chewing the cud and look around to see what is the matter. The whole stable is in an uproar. Hired man gets up and kicks the cow. The cow kicks back. A battle is imminent. You put in an appearance and the disturbance comes to an end.

It does? Yes, but not before your cows have used up a good deal of energy in the excitement of the moment, and wasted energy never means good milk or the usual quantity of it. Pay? Not much. If you can find a hired man who will not yell and kick, do it. You never will make a better investment.

And now the city farmer packs up his belongings and gives over the care of the farm to hired help, while he hies away to the city's glare, its many attractions. None but the wealthy can enjoy it. But the progressive farmer is not without his enjoyments, his papers, his music, his song. He is enjoying the fruits of hard spring, summer and fall labors, and the winter is his vacation, so to speak, with the bins and the barrels loaded with good things, and nothing to worry him. Come panics and hard winter, they do not affect his larder.

NOTES.

Do not destroy the flavor of butter by using too much salt.

Love of live stock is one of the essential elements of successful stock raising.

Feeding a little linseed meal occasionally to stock is beneficial, keeping the system regulated.

Have you ever gone through your stable with a broom, sweeping the dust and cobwebs down that accumulate in the vacant corners? Looked much better after you did so, didn't it? We'll wager that you appreciated the effort, and the horses did too, if they could talk. Try it, friends. Then you can take your team from their stalls and not get your Sunday clothes covered with cobwebs and dust.

Commence to feed a dairy cow for dairy purposes by the time she is a yearling. Then by breeding a heifer six months younger for dairy than for beef, you set going this much earlier in life all the mammary glands and milk-ducts, while nature puts forth every effort to prepare milk for the youngster on the road. If left until older, nature seeks to turn the surplus food into fat as having no other requirement.

It is very hard to reconcile the interests of the producer and the consumer. The producer desires to receive high prices and the consumer desires to pay low prices. The only point that all agree to desire is the abundant production which makes moderate prices profitable and satisfactory to all concerned.

ORCHARD NOTES.

One peach tree having the "yellows" will infest the whole orchard. Got a good sprayer? If not, why not?

When did you last manure that orchard?

Any insect eggs on the apple trees? Scrape them off.

Any blighted limbs on the pear trees? But saw them off away oelow.

The time to prune trees is when you are ready. You should be ready now.

Just as like as not the orchard has not had a forkful of manure for two years.

They still call it San Jose scale, ignoring the fact that it is a louse that concerns the orchardist. The scale is harmless; the louse does the mischief.

Secretary Wilson does not stop with statistics, in his annual report. He gives standards of purity for foods, both natural and manufactured. Much attention by his scientific experts has been given to milk and its products. Standards for these and for meats, vegetables and manufactured foods are given.
