COULDN'T SUCCEED.

How Anna Dickinson Tried to Get Drunk and Failed.

[Chicago Letter.]
"Yes," said an old English friend of mine, "I have seen all the actors of any note who have been on the boards during the last fifty years; have listened to the most of the great singers and musical artists during that time, and I believe there is but one person, besides myself, in Chicago, who has ever listened to Paganini's divine tones. I believe any intelligent person, although he may not happen to be a newspaper man, is able to form a pretty correct judgment after that number of years of experience and observation. You remember that I told you that Anna Dickinson would never be more than a curiosity as 'Hamlet,' when the announcement was first made that she would appear in that part. Now, my reason for that was, that although Anna is, in many ways, really a nice fellow, she is not altogether virile and manly. I don't believe that I ever told you that story of her attempt to get drunk. Well, whenever she wishes to express an opinion upon any subject, either privately or in public, she makes herself practically the master, as far as possible, of experiments and experiences, giving her nearly absolute knowledge in the matter.
Some years ago she was interested in the subject of intemperance. First, she read up the subject thoroughly from a scientific, ethical and social standpoint. Then she secured male attire and passed days and nights, not only in the fashionable resorts of vice and intemperance, but in and about the lowest dives in New York and Philadelphia. Not satisfied with seeing all that could be seen of drunkenness and its results, she concluded to go to work systematically and get drunk herself. At this time she was boarding at the Continental in the latter city. She got one or two confidential friends in her room, arranged to have a physician within call, and then, ordering liquors, set about getting chock-full in a most methodical fashion. First she drank freely of the lighter wines. These had no effect upon her, when she resorted to stronger liquors. She drank on until she had taken about everything from claret to straight 'old Crow,' and enough altogether to have sent a dozen roystering Scotchmen under the table. Still she was not drunk. All of a sudden, however, Miss Anna jumped about four feet in the air, clasped her head in her hands wildly, and gave a very womanly sort of a shriek. The doctor was immediately called, and declared that one more glass of liquor would have surely had a fatal effect. She was promptly pumped out, and this result was several weeks' serious illness. But, mind you, she did not get drunk!"
"Now," continued the old gentleman, his eyes twinkling with merriment, "the reason why Anna Dickinson can't play 'Hamlet' are identical with those why she can't get drunk—and a fellow's no fellow at all, you know, if he can't get full—she simply can't do it!"
I subsequently learned from a hotel clerk in this city, who was formerly at the Continental, that this statement regarding Miss Dickinson's experiment with liquor was true, and it came very near being the cause, at one time, of very unjust accusations against Miss Dickinson's character.

A few years ago large farms were all the rage in England. Small holdings were scouted, and confident predictions were made that they would share the fate of the hand-loom and the spinning-wheel. Now the tide has turned, and it is running as strongly in the other direction. Large farms cannot be let; small holdings are snapped up at once. According to Land, there is all through the west and the midlands the keenest competition for small farms, and men who a few years ago were in possession of farms of 200 or 250 acres, without possessing the capital necessary for their proper cultivation, are now taking farms of 40 or 50 acres, upon which, if they have less capital than they had five or six years ago, they will have a larger capital in proportion to their holding, and better security, than they had to encourage them in the free use of their capital and skill alike. An agricultural, if not an agrarian, revolution is thus going on silently, which can hardly fail profoundly to modify both the political and social conditions of English rural life.

An Elaborate Costume.
It is said that the belle of the late big Piute fandango at Walker Lake was the cynosure of all eyes, and a study for a sculptor. She was dressed in a jewsharp and a string of beads—Virginia (Nev.) Enterprise.

Bismarck seems to have faith in both allopathy and homoeopathy. At one of the summer resorts that he frequents, he is treated by Dr. Cohn of Hamburg, an allopathist; at Kissingen another allopathic physician handles him; and at Berlin a noted Homoeopathist has been his physician since 1870. At times he has had both allopathic and homoeopathic schools together in consultation, being evidently determined to be on the right side anyway. He has a troublesome nervous affection. It was glory enough for homoeopathy when at the Berlin conference both Beaconsfield and Bismarck had medical advisers of that school. And still the Italian Government refuses to aid homoeopathic colleges, on the ground that the theory of infinitesimal, like-by-like doses "is the negation of all science."

The delightful climate of California has its disadvantages, and among these one of the most serious is the strong and chilling winds that blow from the ocean at some points along the coast. What makes this particularly important is the fact that the soil is often cultivated to the very verge of the beach, where vegetation, grain, and fruit, that would otherwise flourish luxuriantly, feel the winds keenly. It is now proposed to remedy this evil by planting dense rows of hardy trees along the coast to form a barrier against the winds. That would also serve the useful end of helping to fix the shifting sands. It is more than likely that in course of time the coast of California will present the novel spectacle of unbroken woodland extending along the very edge of the ocean for hundreds of miles.

The head of a Chicago firm dealing in gambling instruments is a woman. She showed an inquirer a "brace" dealing box for faro, so made that two cards could be slid out through the lid at once, and said she sold more of them than of the honest boxes. "The faro games in the big cities are often square," she added, "but in smaller towns the dealer generally goes for all the money in sight." She also showed devices for cheating at poker, one consisting of a small clip for holding concealed cards under the coat, but they were all unavailable in the hands of a novice, considerable skill in handling cards being requisite to their use without being easily detected.
