MY WESTERN HOME.

Oh! westward, the land of mountain and stream,
Where Nature has lavished her beauty and art;
Where peace and prosperity ever shall reign;
'Twas built as a shrine for every true heart.

Like a jewel set in a monarch's crown,
It shines with radiance unsurpassed,
No bright will ever destroy that gleam,
But 'twill ever remain a star to the last—

A star which all the world shall know,
Sung of by poets, or written by sage,
Its name shall grace our nation's brow,
And shine from history's bright page.

The East may tell of its glacial domes,
And all that wealth may buy;
Of powerful marts of busy trade,
And all that pleases the eye.

The deeds of its warriors, or tongue of its sage,
May tell of its beauty and worth;
Yet, as the ivy clings to the sturdy oak,
"Clings my heart to the land of its birth—

To its mountains so lofty, with pine-crowned peaks,
Its valleys, so calmly asleep in their breast,
With rivers flowing so peacefully fair,
Its beauty, untold wealth, so rare.

Such is my home, with comfort and rest,
In the golden land of the glorious West;
Its acres are broad, with plenty are filled,
Awaiting the ox or the plow.

An honest heart and sturdy hand
To make it more lovely than now.
Then, hurrah for our home in the beautiful West!
Where plenty smiles bright on the poor;

To the homeless child of want and distress
It holds ever a wide open door.
Oh, grand old mountains, I would be loth to leave you

And seek some other clime,
For naught can stir or deceive you—
You are God's work divine.

My home 'mid mountains, smiling streams and valleys,
Where skies reflect their soft'ning gleam,
Would my pen were magic to enthral thee,
My life's brightest dream;

How would my work in colors glowing,
Set thee to music soft as the azure skies,
Sweet as the tone of an Eolian harp,
Kissed by the breeze hurrying by.

How can they call thee rough or rugged,
With smiling vales and everlasting hills?
Do they see no beauty in a perfect picture,
That they should slight and pass you by?

Where can you find—go search the wide world over—
A more beautiful clime?

'Tis like sweet voices blended together
In soft and perfect rhyme.

No matter where my fate may lead me,
I still dream, dear home, of thee,
Of thy hills and vales in golden splendor,
O'er which memory casts a veil so tender;

Thy beauties still I will ever see—
Oh, no! I never could forget you,
Land of my birth and childhood's home,
My heart will cling to it now and ever,
As the dearest spot that I have known.

Land of my birth, no tongue can tell
How I would grieve to say farewell.
Oh, beautiful land of the setting sun,
I will come to thee when life's journey's done,
I will come to thee as a child to rest,
And lay me down on the grassy breast.

Mrs. M. T. THORNTON.
Hailey, Idaho, July 26, 1882.

An Heiress Takes the Veil.

BALTIMORE, July 24.—Miss Emily McTavish, a wealthy society young lady who in May last suddenly renounced the world and entered the convent of Mount de Sales as a novice, was yesterday invested with the nun's veil at that institution, adopting instead of her own name that of Sister Mary Agnes. The ceremony took place in the chapel. No one was present except the members of her family and two or three invited friends. A peculiarity of the ceremony was that neither the aspirant nor the nuns were in the chapel, but in a small adjoining wing, built off the chapel and separated by a dark, heavy grating. In this the nuns are not visible from the chapel. This grating is typical of the renunciation of the world by the order. Through a small door in the grating her sisters communicated with the aspirant, who was dressed in full and handsome bridal costume. She wore a heavy, white satin, cut in train and caught up with buds and orange blossoms. A veil enveloped her shapely figure in a fleecy cloud. This typified her wedding with the church. Sister Mary Agnes now remains at Mount de Sales as one of the sisters whose chief mission, apart from their religious duties, is the instruction of young ladies. Miss MacTavish is descended from one of the oldest families of the country, which is closely connected with noted families of England. Through the Catons they are very closely related to three noble houses, and General Winfield Scott was the grandfather of the present generation. The step taken was to her many friends a sudden one, but it had long been considered. For years past Miss MacTavish had been remarked among those of her religion as one exemplarily pious. She is wealthy, exceedingly handsome and graceful, well educated, well read, and was appreciative of the pleasures and healthfulness of out-of-door sports, given often to a spirited dash after the hounds across the country. She was widely known in the highest social circles of the State. She is believed to have a private fortune of over $500,000.
