ST. MARY'S ACADEMY.

A Splendid School, Managed by Faithful Instructors—Its Growth and Plans, and the Course of Study—A Better School than Ever Before, and More Largely Attended.

Salt Lake Tribune, November 5.

Those who devote their lives to the welfare and happiness of others seldom have their reward in this world; but when in addition to such life-long devotion, there is added a self-abnegation which shuns all publicity, and seeks to be unknown save through its works, and then only impersonally, the chance of public appreciation and reward is infinitely lessened. But there are those who note not the world nor its applause, and Salt Lake City has a community of bright and faithful women of this character, who earn the gratitude of thousands, and whose efforts in behalf of the young, more especially, should bring them a covering of blessings sufficient to protect them from all ills. We refer now to those who conduct that popular and growing institution of learning, St. Mary's Academy. Their lives are lives of toil, in behalf of those committed to their fostering care and exemplary instruction. The years of their days are passed in study and severe work. In order to fit themselves properly and conscientiously for their trust, they have delved deep into the stores of culture, and exhausted research in the several branches they teach. As a consequence, the instructors of this school are thorough mistresses of their calling; deep scholars, full learned in what they teach, from the highest branches of mathematics to the elementary principals in which the primary classes are drilled. Study is their life-long business, not only in the ordinary educational work, but also in the languages, in music, painting and drawing. The teachers of the French and German classes are natives of France and Germany respectively, and the accent the pupils hear in those tongues is accurate and pure. There are fifteen teachers in all in the school.

The building devoted to the school is on one of the loveliest spots in the city. The grounds are adorned with the choicest shrubs and trees, whose arrangement and growth have been the personal care and labor of the Sisters. There are ample walks for exercise, and play-grounds for diversion. There is plenty of room, and yet more will be needed for the extensive and wonderful institution this growing school is bound to become. Accordingly, those in charge lose no opportunity of adding to their grounds, and they have recently acquired a fine lot of ground lying to the west of their old boundaries. The building is a fine, large, airy three-story brick, whose halls and rooms are commodious, and are thronged with girls whose hearts are as light as their tripping feet. More than two hundred of them are here; ninety-five boarders and one hundred and ten day pupils. They study all the branches, and are divided into nine English classes, numbering from twelve to twenty-five each; the music classes number from 110 to 120; drawing and painting, 38 to 40; and in the latter are many ladies of the city who attend for instruction, practice and guidance in these graceful accomplishments. Altogether, the school is stronger, better and more thronged than ever before.

Great attention is given to music and vocal culture. The whole school is thoroughly practised in singing, and there is thorough special vocal training beside, for the special classes. It is a great work to train so many to sing together, but it is done. We saw a fine example of it the other day, and also of the good work done by the music pupils, many of whom were ready at the word to hear a limited number, we were delighted by a piano duet on one instrument by the two little girls, Maud and Annie Keeley of Blackfoot; a trio on the same instrument by the three little Warren sisters; the "Light Cavalry Duet" by Misses Childs and Shaughnessy, and a fine vocal exercise, "Ruth and Naomi," by Misses Stoddard and McIntyre, with Miss Shaughnessy for accompanist. No finer concert do we wish to hear. The facilities for music study are excellent; there are ten pianos in constant use, and more would be needed but that many of the students have instruments at home, on which they practice. There is a splendid harp, altogether the finest in the west, and a class of four who use it. There are six or seven guitars, and an organ.

The course of instruction in the scholastic branches is most thorough. A complete knowledge of the ground gone over is required before promotion can be had, and a perfect knowledge of the studies is insisted upon. Practical knowledge of business affairs is inculcated, and the instruction is especially strong in mathematics and grammar. Book-keeping, the discounting of notes, and business work, practical accounts, as of house-keeping, the measurement of walls for papering or plastering, or floors for carpeting, etc., are part of the system of instruction. There is a Latin class, and to the writing of composition and letters two hours a week of faithful work are given. In short, nothing is omitted to insure perfection in a thorough English and practical course of study.

There is besides, one afternoon a week devoted to plain sewing, and ornamental and fancy work, which includes with the boarders drill and neatness and order in their beds and appurtenances, keeping their wardrobes in order, mending and darning so that the darn shall not be known from the original knitting.

There is a flourishing society among the pupils called the Augusta Literary society, for whose use there is a cabinet of choice books, selected with a view to the broadest culture; and there is besides a general library. We notice on the shelves Hume and Gibbon, and other writers whose repute for religious tendencies is at a low ebb, but they are not tabooed in this liberal minded institution. And right here we may as well say that while Catholic parents can have their children trained here in the strictest requirements of the faith, no pressure whatever of a sectarian character is brought to bear upon the general pupils, in whose cases only the ordinary moral culture and proprieties everywhere recognized are imparted.

A fine cabinet of beautiful and rich specimens adorns the west hall, and in the same is the beginning of a collection of philosophical apparatus. Additions to the latter have been written for to Philadelphia. They will include globes, scales, mathematical instruments, heliometer, etc. A complete school, such as this, needs everything in the educational line, and it will all be provided in time.

To the south of the main school is St. Joseph's School, for boys, in which are eighty pupils, thirty of whom are boarders, from the Territories and from the States. They receive instruction in the English branches, music, French, German, the elements of drawing and vocal culture. This school is entirely separate from the Academy.

It was intended to begin this year the erection of an addition to the main academy, but now it will not be begun till next year, when it will be pushed to speedy completion. It is to be an L, to the north, 60x70 feet, in the same style as to the main building. The halls of the present academy will be continued through the new, and the main hall will have a length of 200 feet. One floor of the new building will be devoted to music, one will be a large study hall, and one will be devoted to dining halls and play rooms. The Academy is a grand, growing institution, and the public will rejoice with the Tribune in its prosperity and expansion.
